Mistrial might be nearing in Clancy case

Jurors again say they're deadlocked as judge continues to urge them to keep at it

PLYMOUTH — Jurors in Lindsay Clancy's murder trial ended another day of deliberations without reaching a verdict Wednesday, and, for the second consecutive day, alerted the judge they have been unable to reach a unanimous decision. Once again, Plymouth Superior Court Judge William F. Sullivan instructed them to keep trying. They have deliberated for 29½ hours over whether Clancy is not guilty by reason of insanity for killing her three children in 2023, or guilty of murder or manslaughter. They will resume deliberations for the sixth day on Thursday.

The growing possibility of a hung jury leaves the outcome of the high-profile case uncertain. It has already attracted a massive audience and sparked public outrage over gaps in psychiatric care and women's postpartum mental health.

"There is no reason to suppose that the case will ever be submitted to 12 persons who are more intelligent, more impartial, or more competent to decide it than you are . . . it is your duty to decide this case, if you can do so conscientiously," Sullivan told jurors Wednesday afternoon. He was responding to a note they sent after lunch, indicating they were deadlocked.

He read instructions known as the Tuey-Rodriguez charge, and commonly referred to as a "dynamite charge," aimed at urging jurors to avoid a mistrial by listening to contrary opinions and following instructions on the law.

In the event of a mistrial, prosecutors would have to decide whether to retry Clancy.

Jurors appeared tired but serious when they filed into the courtroom after lunch; their expressions

With 2028 race looming, Democrats shift left

By Samantha J. Gross and Sam Brodey

The most enduring impact of Senator Ed Markey's massive primary win Tuesday may not be that he was more progressive than his rival.

It's that Markey, at 80 years old, is now cruising toward reelection as one of the most self-styled progressive Senate candidates anywhere in the country, an embodiment of the shift by Democratic voters to the left ahead of another presidential primary cycle in which progressive candidates are hoping to gain significant traction.

There was Markey's emphatic, repeated promise to pass Medicare for All — not "universal health care," as his challenger Representative Seth Moulton wanted, but the progressive-approved name brand — and his equally emphatic calls to abolish US Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Not just that, but Markey went conspicuously further than fellow Democrats on other issues, including in his proud support for impeaching President Trump a third time — a prospect that Moulton, and top Democratic congressional leaders, have downplayed.

Most notably, Markey leaned into the issue of transgender rights more than perhaps any other high-profile Democrat running this year. Of course, Moulton's controversial comments about trans youth in sports after the 2024 election became a weakness Markey regularly exploited. But

FALL RIVER — Fresh from their primary coronations, Governor Maura Healey and Republican challenger Michael Minogue both said Wednesday that they are running against the failed records of their political opponents this fall.

The thing is, their foils look very different.

After coasting through her Democratic race unopposed on Tuesday, Healey used her first public campaign stop in this South Coast city to again predominantly frame her reelection effort as one countering President Trump.

Minogue, opting to hold no public events the day after a landslide victory in his Republican primary, cast his first bid for public office as undoing Healey's "failed" first four years as governor.

The dichotomy offered both a taste of what voters can expect in the newly formed general election fight, and, for the candidates, a test of how central Trump remains to the concerns, fears, and desires that animate their choices at the ballot.

UNCOVERING THEIR NAMES FROM A LONG-BURIED PAST

A plan is underway to memorialize Black women put in unmarked graves at cemetery

By Mike Damiano

At Cedar Grove Cemetery in Dorchester, there are two burial sections side by side for deceased residents of Beacon Hill homes for "aged women": one for elderly white women and one for elderly Black women.

But there is a striking difference between them. For every grave of a white woman, there is a headstone bearing her name. The graves of the Black women are unmarked.

This inequality has persisted for more than 150 years, since the Home for Aged Colored Women began burying its residents at Cedar Grove in 1873. Now, a group of neighbors, former city officials, and nonprofit leaders are trying to fix it.

On Wednesday evening, an art installation was unveiled at the site and the names of the 133 women known to have been buried there were read off during a ceremony. Eventually, the group plans to install permanent memorials with the women's names.

Nearly 100 people filled the pews of the cemetery's chapel, as violinist Adrian Anantawan performed as they arrived for the 5 p.m. ceremony.

"We cannot change the circumstances of the burial, but we can change what happens now," said Diana Lam, president of the Boston Women's Heritage Trail. "We can speak their names, we can honor their lives, we can tell their stories, and we can ensure the future generations know that these women were here."

The project began when Joyce Linehan, a former aide to ex-Boston mayor Martin J. Walsh who lives in Dorchester, walked her dog past the burial site and noticed it was marked only by a stone inscribed with the name of the Home for Aged Colored Women. She wondered who was buried there and started asking questions.

Tompkins found not guilty of corruption charges

Plans to resume duties as sheriff

By Danny McDonald
GLOBE STAFF

In an extraordinary turn, a well-known Boston politician emerged smiling at the end of his trial on federal corruption charges, as a jury acquitted Suffolk Sheriff Steven W. Tompkins of two counts of extortion on Wednesday, concluding a closely watched case centering on the Democrat's dealings with a cannabis company.

Federal prosecutors alleged Tompkins used his position as sheriff to strongarm Ascend Wellness Holdings for money twice — once for early access to purchase $50,000 worth of stock in the company and later to get his money back after the stock value tanked.

But the case represented a swing-and-miss for the US attorney in Massachusetts, which has successfully prosecuted multiple local politicians and law enforcement officials alike. After deliberating for 3½ hours on Wednesday, the jury rejected the prosecutors' claims and found Tompkins not guilty on both counts.

A relieved and emotional Tompkins patted one of his defense attorneys on the back before embracing some of his supporters in the courtroom after the verdicts.

"I'm feeling jubilant, man," said Tompkins, 69, outside the courthouse in the Seaport after the proceedings.

By Sakchai Lalit and Anton L. Delgado
ASSOCIATED PRESS

PATTAYA, Thailand — The USS Abraham Lincoln aircraft carrier, which spent nearly nine months at sea to support US operations against Iran, docked at a port in eastern Thailand on Wednesday to give the crew of about 5,000 an opportunity for beachside rest and recuperation.

The sailors and Marines aboard the nuclear-powered ship had not been on shore for more than 260 days, and reports emerged last month of deteriorating mental health among the crew as well as shortages of key food supplies aboard.

The Navy downplayed any problems, and President Trump commented that the Lincoln’s lengthy deployment was “not nearly long enough.”

The Lincoln, launched in 1988 and as long as about three American football fields, made its way into the Laem Chabang port in Thailand’s Chonburi province Wednesday morning shortly after the destroyer USS Frank E. Petersen Jr., one of several ships in its carrier strike group, sailed past the area. Another, the guided-missile cruiser USS Robert Smalls, headed to Map Ta Phut in neighboring Rayong province.

The Lincoln’s crew members later debarked to spend their free time in nearby Pattaya, a seaside resort city that US military personnel have frequented since the Vietnam War era.

Crew members were not immediately accessible to media, but the ship itself looked due for at least a new paint job, with large blotches of what appeared to be rust on the hull, especially just above the waterline and at the edge of the flight deck, where fighter aircraft and helicopters were parked.

The US Embassy said the ship has been deployed for a total of 286 days since November, and that Thailand was the ship’s first full port stop in that time. Its total uninterrupted time at sea before Wednesday’s arrival was 264 days.

When asked about the carrier’s appearance, Captain Dan Keeler, the Lincoln’s commanding officer, replied that “it is normal for a long deployment and we’re not going to make further comments.”

“It looks like what it is: a ship that’s been continuously at sea for 286 days,” Euan Graham, a defense expert at the Australian National Security College, told the Associated Press after reviewing photos of the ship. “And the Abraham Lincoln has been on a prolonged combat deployment, during which normal port calls were denied to it.

“So it becomes a tempting symbol of the US Navy’s strategic overstretch and fatigue,” he added. “However, what’s also notable is the impressive state of the air wing. So maybe the underlying story is also one of resilience under conditions of extreme stress.”

The Navy had dismissed reports about sailors onboard struggling with mental health concerns. A Navy official said a sailor aboard the Lincoln went overboard in early August but the person was quickly recovered, treated by the ship’s medical department, and transferred off ship for follow-on care. The official would not say whether it was considered a suicide attempt.

In Pattaya, welcome banners hung outside restaurants and bars, and a local gem store touted its self-described special deals. A giant LED sign in front of the city’s famous Walking Street, a nightlife hub, features a welcome message with images of the Lincoln, as well as the Thai and US flags.

Pattaya’s mayor, Poramet Ngampichet, said he expected the visit could generate about 100 million baht ($3 million) for the city.

Once known mostly as a seedy city of bars and massage parlors offering sexual services, the city has in recent years toned down its act to become more of a family destination, with attractions such as theme parks and golf courses.

Visitors to Pattaya on Wednesday included Shakeira Fairfax, the mother of a crew member, who traveled to Thailand to meet her daughter Jada.

“I’m excited. I’m so full of emotion. I can’t wait to hold her. I can’t wait to snuggle up next to her,” said Shakeira, who hails from Paterson, N.J. She spoke to the AP outside Pattaya’s Hard Rock Hotel, where city officials welcomed dozens of service members arriving by bus.

She said her daughter, an entry-level seaman, finished basic training in October and shipped out for the Lincoln’s deployment in mid-November, later celebrating her 25th birthday on board.

Another carrier, the usually Asia-based USS George Washington, relieved the Lincoln in the Middle East in August.

Judge blocks order on citizens

Says Supreme Court ruling settled the issue

By Zach Montague
NEW YORK TIMES

A federal judge in Maryland temporarily blocked much of President Trump’s latest effort to withhold citizenship from babies born in the United States to noncitizen parents, ruling that the Supreme Court had already settled questions reopened by an executive order Trump signed in August.

While the decision was limited to children born after Feb. 19, 2025, including those born in the future, Judge Deborah L. Boardman wrote that the order would likely affect babies the Supreme Court had already defined as citizens. The ruling delivered a sharp rejection of the president’s renewed efforts to restrict birthright citizenship, after the Supreme Court ruled 6-3 in July that a previous, more sweeping, executive order from 2025 was unconstitutional.

“No presidential executive order can undo what the Supreme Court has done,” she wrote.

Boardman’s order took a dim view of the Trump administration’s reasoning, which she characterized as a thinly veiled attempt to get around the Supreme Court’s decision. She wrote that the president and others named in the lawsuit “completely misread” the majority’s opinion and embraced a “distorted interpretation” of its conclusions.

In a 35-page opinion, she described the latest order as only the most recent attempt to curtail birthright citizenship by any means that could survive legal scrutiny.

“Since his second term in office began on January 20, 2025, the president has tried, through executive order, to upend our country’s longstanding tradition of birthright citizenship and eliminate, for large swaths of Americans, the right to citizenship by birth, a right enshrined in the Citizenship Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment,” she wrote.

Boardman described a number of ways that children covered by the lawsuit could have their citizenship rescinded, including if the Trump administration moved to label their parents members of terrorist groups or “alien enemies” under arbitrary legal determinations. She cited a pattern in which the administration has accused Venezuelan nationals of being affiliated with the criminal organization Tren de Aragua, often without evidence, in deportation proceedings.

While she stressed that it was too soon to find that the order itself was unconstitutional, she wrote that it already appeared clear that it was unconstitutional as applied to the class of babies defined when immigration groups initially sued last year to block Trump’s first order.

The order this year had included other measures to create novel categories of babies that could be disqualified from citizenship, including those born to parents engaged in so-called birth tourism, through which mothers deliberately traveled to the United States to give birth.

It was unclear how the Trump administration planned to tag those it suspected of traveling to the United States to have their children. But Boardman noted that the executive order was broad, describing anyone who engaged in a “commercial transaction” — such as purchasing a plane ticket — as traveling to access birthright citizenship.

The Supreme Court’s decision upholding birthright citizenship “is the law of the land,” Boardman wrote. “The President must follow it.”

Edouard soaks Texas with rain, flash flooding

PORT ARTHUR, Texas — The former Tropical Storm Edouard weakened into a depression but dumped nearly 2 feet of rain in some places, flooded roads, and knocked down trees Wednesday in parts of Texas as it slowly moved north.

Schools and municipal offices were closed, residents were told to stay home, and a news station captured a water rescue of a family. Some areas northwest of Beaumont, where the center of the storm passed Tuesday, received between 10 inches and 21 inches of rain in a matter of hours, the National Weather Service and emergency officials said.

The storm was downgraded Tuesday night, hours after making landfall near the Texas-Louisiana border with maximum sustained winds of 60 miles per hour, according to the National Hurricane Center. The system weakened as it moved inland but still produced heavy rain and some flooding Wednesday. It was expected to break up by evening.

The center of Edouard passed over Beaumont in Jefferson County, about 80 miles northeast of Houston.

By Wednesday, the main concern was restoring power after trees and limbs were brought down during the storm, with wind gusts up to 90 miles per hour, said Robert Grimm, the county emergency management coordinator. About 30,000 customers were without power as of Wednesday morning, a big chunk of the more than 70,000 utility customers affected statewide, according to power-outage.com.

1 adult hurt after shooting at Va. elementary school

An adult was wounded in a shooting at a Virginia elementary school Wednesday morning, according to an official who responded to the scene and confirmed no children were injured.

Jim Wood, a Waynesboro city council member whose district includes Westwood Hills Elementary School, said in a phone interview that the shooting was an isolated event and that the shooter is no longer a threat. He declined to further elaborate on the suspect’s status.

“This is a one-on-one incident,” said Wood, who was at a nearby event Wednesday morning and went to the scene. He later went to a church, where he said children were being reunited with their families.

The adult victim was taken to a hospital with injuries not considered life-threatening, Wood said.

Robin Lawson, a spokesperson for Virginia State Police, also confirmed that initial reports indicate one adult was injured and no children were harmed.

Waynesboro police have not yet released a full statement on the shooting, but Lawson said one would be forthcoming Wednesday afternoon.

Wood said he could not identify the suspect or confirm any connection between that person and the victim.

Video from local media showed several emergency vehicles outside the school.

Pabst Blue Ribbon offers $20,000 reward to help find its missing beer

Pabst Blue Ribbon wants its beer back, and it’s offering a reward to help that happen.

Greig DeBow, the chief executive of Pabst Brewing Co., said Wednesday that the company will pay up to $20,000 to anyone who provides new information that leads to the recovery of 1,602 cases of Pabst Blue Ribbon and nonalcoholic Old Milwaukee beer. The beer went missing Aug. 17 in Southern California.

“I’m sure they look cool with a garage full of PBR,” DeBow said in a post on TikTok. “That’s actually not cool though. We want it back.”

Police in Montclair, Calif., said the beer was stolen from a warehouse in two separate incidents on the same day.

In the first heist, about $45,000 worth of beer headed to Tucson, Ariz., was picked up but never delivered, according to police. An hour later, a “purported subcontracting company” submitted fake documents to pick up another $25,000 worth of beer, Montclair police said. Both thefts occurred on Aug. 17 at an Anheuser-Busch distribution center about 40 miles east of Los Angeles.

All told, the thieves made off with 40,000 pounds of beer, Pabst said. Police estimated that the stolen beer was worth $70,000.

DeBow said the company wants the beer to be returned by Sept. 9. Anyone with information is asked to email hotline@pabst.com.

Iran targets US allies with Gulf strikes

Latest retaliatory attacks follow a surge in violence

By David Rising and Samy Magdy
ASSOCIATED PRESS

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates — Iran fired on US allies in the Gulf early Wednesday following a night of American bombardment that Iranian state media says included a deadly strike on a wedding party.

The latest violence came after a monthlong lull in fighting. The six-month war has led to a spike in oil prices, roiled the global economy, and posed increasing political problems for US President Trump's Republican Party ahead of November midterm elections.

Fighting has escalated since the American military hit Iranian rocket launchers on an island in the Strait of Hormuz over the weekend, saying Iran was planning to use them to lay mines. Iran retaliated by firing missiles at American bases in Jordan that were intercepted.

American military resources are stretched and political pressure in Washington is mounting, while Iran's economy has been battered by sanctions and an American naval blockade. Iran's currency hit another record low on Wednesday, with traders in Tehran exchanging 2.20 million rials for one US dollar, a 10 percent hike from last week's record.

Neither side can continue indefinitely between full-scale war and a truce, said Hamidreza Azizi, senior Iran analyst at the Crisis Group, an international think tank.

"At some point, one of the sides may see a need to escalate in order to break this cycle," he cautioned. "So that could bring the two sides to a point that they have been trying to avoid until now, which is a full-scale war."

The latest flare-up in violence came as the standoff seemed to be shifting slightly more in the US favor, with the price of oil hitting around $80 a barrel last month and Iranian leaders talking about growing economic hardships, said Sascha Bruchmann, an analyst with the International Institute for Strategic Studies' Middle East office in Bahrain.

"The U.S. is trying to reinstall some kind of confidence into the global oil markets ... and the Iranians had to respond to that by reinserting insecurity and doubt," Bruchmann said.

MORTEZA AKHOONDI/TASNIM NEWS AGENCY VIA ASSOCIATED PRESS

On Wednesday, people inspected the damage at a building that Iranian media said was hit by a US strike while a wedding celebration was taking place there, in Kuhestak, southern Iran. Four people were killed and at least 68 were wounded.

Since the fighting resumed over the weekend, the price of Brent crude oil, the international standard, has climbed to around $95, up more than 30 percent from the start of the war.

US Secretary of State Marco Rubio said Iran will "continue to feel the squeeze" from the United States until it drops any nuclear weapons ambitions and ends support for armed groups in the Middle East. Iran has always insisted its nuclear program is peaceful.

Following the strikes on Jordan, US Gulf allies Kuwait and Bahrain said they had also come under attack, without reporting any casualties.

"You will soon see that Iran's new strategy on the battlefield, in diplomacy, and in confronting the economic blockade will shatter your foundations," the recently appointed head of Iran's powerful Supreme National Security Council, Mohsen Rezaei, said on X.

In Iraq, where Iranian-backed forces are active, Kurdish authorities said they had intercepted 10 drones laden with explosives in the Irbil area. Iranian television reported that American bases in Irbil had been targeted.

Israel's military also said that Iran-backed Hezbollah fired two explosive drones at its soldiers in southern Lebanon, without causing casualties.

RAZIEH POUDAT/ISNA VIA ASSOCIATED PRESS

The US Central Command said Tuesday's strikes focused on Iranian military targets, including air defense sites, radar systems, and maritime assets.

One US strike hit a home hosting a wedding in Kuhestak, a small coastal town overlooking the Strait of Hormuz, according to Iranian state media.

Four people were killed — two women and two children, aged 4 and 16 — and at least 68 were wounded, the state news agency IRNA and state TV said Wednesday. Just after the strike, Ahmad Nafisi, the province's deputy governor, told Iranian state television that five people were killed. There was no explanation for the change.

Several heavy explosions shook Kuhestak, with fireballs that lit up the night sky, according to security camera footage carried by the semiofficial Fars news agency.

Images from Iran's semiofficial Tasnim news agency showed several hospitalized children being treated for injuries at a hospital in the nearby town of Minab, where a US missile strike on the opening day of the war hit a primary school, killing more than 100 children.

Macron, King Charles III view tapestry

LONDON — French President Emmanuel Macron and Britain's King Charles III hailed the Bayeux Tapestry as a symbol of their countries' intertwined stories as they visited the 1,000-year-old artwork Wednesday at its temporary home in the British Museum.

The two heads of state viewed the embroidered depiction of the 1066 Norman conquest of England alongside new Prime Minister Andy Burnham, who is eager to restitch bonds between Britain and its neighbors that have been frayed by Brexit.

Charles praised the agreement between Britain and France that brought the priceless, fragile tapestry to London, and called its presence there "a precious symbol of trust at a time when trust seems sadly to be in short supply between nations."

Macron said during a reception at the museum that the artwork is "more than just a linen canvas bordered with wool. It represents a whole chapter of French, British and European history."

At least 22 killed in bus crash in Egypt's Sinai Peninsula

CAIRO — At least 22 people, including Egyptians and Jordanians, were killed Wednesday in a passenger bus crash in Egypt's Sinai Peninsula, authorities in both countries said. Twenty-eight others were injured.

The accident happened on a road linking the tourist resorts of Dahab and Nuweiba in South Sinai province, the Egyptian Health Ministry said in a statement.

The ministry said it deployed 20 ambulances to the scene to transport the dead and wounded to nearby hospitals. It didn't elaborate on the victims' nationalities.

The Jordanian Foreign Ministry said there were Jordanians among the casualties, without providing a toll.

The Amman-based al-Mamlaka public broadcaster reported that 10 Jordanians were killed in the crash. It said the bus was bound for Amman from Cairo when it overturned on a road between Dahab and

The Egyptian health ministry didn't elaborate on the causes, but local media reported that the bus overturned after one of its tires blew out.

Traffic accidents claim thousands of lives every year in Egypt, which has a poor transportation safety record. Speeding, bad roads, and poor enforcement of traffic laws are the main reasons for most crashes.

Man acquitted of reporter's killing

VALLETTA, Malta — A jury in Malta on Wednesday acquitted the Maltese businessman accused of being the mastermind of the 2017 car bomb killing of crusading investigative journalist Daphne Caruana Galizia.

Caruana Galizia's killing shocked Europe, led to protests that toppled a prime minister and exposed a culture of impunity on the Mediterranean island nation, the European Union's smallest.

Yorgen Fenech, a prominent Maltese businessman, was indicted in 2021 on charges of complicity and criminal conspiracy. Prosecutors accused him of being the mastermind of the slaying and of having ordered and paid for it.

He pleaded not guilty, and the jury on Wednesday found him not guilty on both counts.

Fenech was the last of a half-dozen people charged in the plot to be prosecuted.

A woman targeted for her anti-corruption investigations Caruana Galizia, 53, was killed on Oct. 16, 2017, by a car bomb that was detonated while she was driving near her home.

She had written extensively about suspected corruption in political and business circles in Malta, with investigative reports targeting people in then-Prime Minister Joseph Muscat's inner circle.

Glitter pleads not guilty to UK charges

LONDON — Gary Glitter, the British glam rock singer whose music is still regularly played at US sports events, pleaded not guilty at a London court Wednesday to four counts of indecently assaulting a girl more than four decades ago.

The musician, whose real name is Paul Gadd, also pleaded not guilty to two counts of indecency and two of sexual intercourse with the same girl when she was between 8 and 11 years old.

Tony Baumgartner, the presiding judge at Southwark Crown Court, said Gadd would face trial starting Nov. 22, 2027.

During the hearing, Gadd,

82, who appeared via video link from a prison in Devon, England, and wore a gray jacket and hat, confirmed his name before a clerk read out brief details of the counts and asked for his pleas.

When prosecutors and police announced initial charges in July, they said the abuse occurred between 1978 and 1981 at a residential address in the Kensington district of London and that it involved a woman who reported the accusations to police early last year.

The clerk said Gadd was accused of having sex with the girl on at least five occasions.

Hong Kong activist jailed

Pleads guilty to foreign collusion

By David Pierson
NEW YORK TIMES

HONG KONG — Joshua Wong, a prominent Hong Kong pro-democracy activist, pleaded guilty on Wednesday to collusion for lobbying Western lawmakers, a case that shows how China treats international outreach as a national security crime.

The maximum penalty for colluding with foreign forces is life in prison.

Wong was accused of conspiring with other campaigners to lobby lawmakers, particularly those in the United States like Nancy Pelosi and Marco Rubio, to impose sanctions on Hong Kong and China. The campaigners sought to pressure officials in China and Hong Kong for greater democratic rights in the semiautonomous territory.

Wong, who turns 30 next month, was one of the youngest activists in a democracy movement that was quashed in 2020 after China introduced a sweeping national security law that effectively outlawed political dissent in Hong Kong.

In a sign of the sensitivity around the case, police officers in tactical vests and police vehicles surrounded the courthouse where Wong's case was being heard on Wednesday.

He is already serving an almost five-year prison term for his role in an unofficial primary election in 2020 organized by the city's pro-democracy camp that the authorities deemed subversive. That case, the city's largest national security trial, led to the conviction of Wong and more than 40 other former politicians and activists.

Wong was arrested on the foreign collusion charge in June last year while in prison. On Wednesday, his lawyers urged the judge, William Tam, to consider a lighter sentence, saying Wong had matured substantially and hoped to one day leave prison so that he could take care of his aging parents.

Wong's repeated prosecutions reflect the drastic political changes that have taken place in Hong Kong, a former British colony, since it was returned to China in 1997. At the time, Beijing agreed to preserve Western-style civil liberties that are not available in mainland China, such as freedom of speech, for 50 years.

Today, the city's Legislature is devoid of any significant opposition and independent media and members of civil society have largely been muzzled. Bookstores accused of carrying subversive books have been closed.

Wong's plea on Wednesday came seven months after a court sentenced Jimmy Lai, a pro-democracy media tycoon, to 20 years in prison on charges of conspiracy to collude with foreign forces and conspiracy to publish seditious materials under the national security law.

The judge said Wong would be sentenced at a later date, but did not provide further details.

Wong rose to prominence in 2012, when at the age of 14 he led a student movement to oppose the introduction of a Chinese national education curriculum in Hong Kong. He later became one of the most internationally-recognized faces of the 2014 Umbrella Movement protests that called for people in Hong Kong to be given the right to vote for their leader. He would appear on the covers of Western magazines and star in a Netflix documentary, "Joshua: Teenager vs. Superpower."

Western legal experts say that Wong and other pro-democracy activists have not been given fair trials by Hong Kong's judges, who are handpicked by the city's chief executive to handle national security cases.

Black Sea attacks threaten global grain supply

Russia, Ukraine target shipping, crops, and farms

By Carlotta Gall and Kamila Hrabchuk
NEW YORK TIMES

MYKOLAIV, Ukraine — It was a bumper harvest this year and barns in southern Ukraine are filled with great golden mounds of grain.

Yet farmers in Ukraine's prime agricultural belt say they are facing ruin, and experts warn the world may be staring at another global food shock as Russia and Ukraine, both major exporters of grain, intensify attacks on ports and shipping in the Black Sea.

“We don’t know how we will survive,” said Viktor Zvirishyn, 57, a farmer who lives in a village in the southern region of Mykolaiv. “There’s almost nowhere to store it,” he added.

Because the grain cannot get out through Ukrainian ports and Black Sea shipping routes have become increasingly precarious, no one wants to buy the grain, he said, and prices have plummeted.

Zvirishyn was already living on the edge. His house and farm were destroyed under Russian occupation at the beginning of Moscow’s invasion in 2022, and he is only just rebuilding and returning to farming.

The invasion displaced thousands of farmers and disrupted grain exports via the Black Sea, causing a global food shock in 2022. Ukraine managed to recover partially from that, regaining some lost territory and negotiating a Black Sea grain deal with Russia, via mediation by Turkey and the United Nations, that allowed exports to resume and farmers to start over.

But this year, Russia began attacks on Ukraine’s last functioning ports and shipping in the Black Sea, again closing down the main export route for Ukrainian grain. Moscow has also extended drone attacks on crops, equipment, and farm buildings in frontline areas.

Ukraine extended its own attacks to include port facilities in southern Russia, and Kyiv has hit at least five Russian tankers carrying grain in August, according to Lloyd’s List, a London-based maritime journal. The result is that grain exports from both Russia and Ukraine have been drastically reduced.

Ukraine exported only 500,000 metric tons of grain from Aug. 1 to Aug. 18. That is just 20 percent of normal levels when the ports are fully functional, Taras Vysotskyi, Ukraine’s minister of agriculture, said in a recent briefing.

Russia’s grain exports were at 1.4 million metric tons from Aug. 1 to Aug. 20, less than half what they were for the same period a year earlier and the lowest in 10 years, according to a bulletin from the Russian Grain Union, a trade group.

Both countries are seeking other export routes. Ukraine is using road and rail, and shipping terminals on the Danube River, but Russia has also started attacking parts of those networks.

The Danube already has limited capacity this year because of drought and can handle only smaller volumes.

The effect of the blockage is hurting Ukraine’s farmers most of all, said Vicki Aken, country director in Ukraine for the US nonprofit Mercy Corps, which works to help farmers like Zvirishyn.

If farmers cannot export their grain, they will probably lose the harvest for lack of storage, Aken said. In a statement last week, she issued an urgent call for a new grain deal, though there is no sign of any talks.

“Ukraine’s farmers have risked their lives for this harvest,” Aken said. “They should not now have their grain stranded — or their livelihoods collapse — because the world has failed to keep a safe route to market open.”

Zvirishyn has rebuilt one room of his house to live in, using bricks scarred by shrapnel from the ruins. He has had to store his grain in a local silo, and the rest is piled in the open under tarpaulins.

He had paid off his debts, he said, but had no money for fuel for his tractor to prepare the land for the new sowing season.

“I am almost out of money now,” he said.

“I don’t know how I will continue.”

Nepal holds symbolic funerals for missing

Over 3,900 still unaccounted for after flash floods

KATHMANDU, Nepal — Tourists previously reported missing in Nepal have made contact with authorities, officials said Wednesday, as families of locals still unaccounted for after last week’s catastrophic floods held symbolic funerals for their loved ones.

Nepal’s Foreign Ministry said 324 foreign nationals have been rescued, while another 590 from 39 countries remain missing following the Aug. 26 floods that killed at least 1,118 people and left more than 3,900 missing.

Australian Prime Minister Anthony Albanese said Wednesday that the number of Australians missing in the disaster had fallen from 43 to 38 after five were confirmed safe overnight.

“Amidst all of this tragedy, we are seeing some positive news. Today, another five Australians have been confirmed safe,” Albanese told reporters in Palau, where he is attending a regional summit.

“We hope, of course, for positive news further, and we’re doing everything we can to work with authorities,” Albanese added.

Sunil Sharma, a spokesperson for the Nepal Tourism Board, said at least five other tourists who were previously reported missing had contacted authorities by email or telephone in recent days.

It is thought the disaster happened when a glacial collapse in the Himalayas sent rock, ice and meltwater into valleys below, triggering powerful floods downstream. The surge entered rivers flowing through Tibet and Nepal, causing them to rise rapidly. Flood waters swept away homes, buildings, roads and bridges, carrying mud and rocks downstream.

Some families in Nuwakot, one of Nepal’s worst-affected districts, have held symbolic funerals for relatives still missing, hoping to free their souls after they were presumed dead.

In Hindu tradition, cremation is an important final rite, and for some families, performing the ceremony even without the bodies of their loved ones provides a sense of spiritual release.

Mukunda Rijal said his cousins and their daughters had not been found, prompting the family to perform a symbolic funeral for them.

Along the banks of the Trishuli River, a priest placed straw effigies representing the missing family members and covered them with small piles of wood before setting them alight. The symbolic funeral pyres were surrounded by offerings to Hindu deities as relatives gathered to perform the final rites.

Authorities in Nepal have also been burying recovered bodies in temporary graves until they can be identified. They are preserving DNA samples, photographing distinguishing facial features, and recording other identifying details to help match the remains with missing people and eventually return them to their families.

On the Chinese side, rescue crews completed a makeshift road to the disaster site at Gyirong Port on the Nepal border, state broadcaster CCTV reported on Wednesday.

Crews have been clearing access for heavy machinery to be used in the search at the border crossing complex, which was washed away by the floods. The road leading to the crossing was destroyed and buried under water, mud and rocks.

At least 21 people have been killed and 541 remain missing in China, according to the Chinese state news agency Xinhua.

Some flood survivors are fleeing the devastation to seek shelter in Nepal’s capital, Kathmandu.

Around 400 survivors, mostly from the town of Timure, about 65 miles west of Kathmandu, have been staying at the Yellow Gumba monastery. The shelter is being organized by locals and relatives, with relief supplies donated by individuals and charity organizations.

Riya Tamang, 21, who fled with her 10-month-old baby as the flood waters approached, is among those taking shelter at the monastery. She lost her grandparents in the disaster.

Her husband, who works as a cook in Gyirong town on the Chinese side of the border, also survived, and the couple now stays in touch through video calls.

‘Miracle house’ that survived Nepal’s floods

Stood firm amid torrent of water, mud, and debris

By Mujib Mashal and Binod Ghimire
NEW YORK TIMES

DHUNGE BAZAAR, Nepal — For some, it has become known as the “miracle” green house. For others arriving to stare in wonderment and take selfies, it is simply “the viral house.”

When a ferocious torrent of water, mud, and debris swept away everything in its path in Nepal last week, it created a whirlpool of destruction around the Pyakurel family home in Dhunge Bazaar. A video spread far and wide on social media, showing the family helplessly looking down from their third-floor balcony at the angry deluge slamming against their home, the waves trying to lap them up.

But the house stood firm.

Chhatra Bahadur Pyakurel, 67, said he had just dropped his grandson off at the school bus and returned home when the floods, caused by a massive glacier collapse in the Himalayan region between Nepal and Tibet, reached their home.

For over an hour, all the family could do was watch the carnage around them — first from the balcony, and then after climbing to the roof, as the wall of water and debris kept growing taller and wilder.

“At first we did not know what would happen or whether we would survive,” Pyakurel said. “But after some time, we realized there was nothing more we could do. Our lives were in the hands of the almighty God, whether he would save us or let us drown.”

“The only thought that kept troubling me was about my grandson, who had already left for school,” he added. “I kept thinking: ‘If we all die, who will look after him?’”

The house went viral as photographs of it still standing, alone amid a wasteland of mud and debris, circulated online. Almost a week after the devastation, as the road in front of the house was partially reopened and traffic returned slowly to Dhunge Bazaar, visitors climbed up the ridge to get a view.

The house has gotten its own pinpoint on Google Maps as a “flood-proof” attraction.

The river had calmed Tuesday, but its water remained muddy. Little beyond the pillars of the first two stories of the house were left. On the third-story balcony, the washing machine remained, along with a pile of laundry. The roof, with its water tanks, a solar water heater, a small family temple, and many tall plants, looked neatly intact.

The house has become one of the rare stories of survival amid a grim picture of devastation, its full extent still growing by the day. The death toll in Nepal rose above 1,100 Wednesday, with almost 4,000 more people still missing, and hundreds more remain unaccounted for in Tibet.

Kakapos exceed 300 after a record 90 births in year

By John Yoon
NEW YORK TIMES

A baby boom among kakapos, a critically endangered parrot species, has resulted in a record number of chicks this year, thrilling conservationists who are working to protect the giant flightless bird that was once on the brink of extinction.

The population of the peculiar, moss green-feathered species fell to a perilous low of just 51 in 1995, according to New Zealand’s Department of Conservation. It said Tuesday that there were now 325 kakapos, after 90 birds born this year were officially added to the tally.

The nocturnal, musty-sweet scented bird uses its big claws and strong legs to climb up to 65 feet into the forest canopy to feed or rest. It also does not breed annually: A key food source like the fruit of rimu trees, evergreens native to New Zealand, nourishes them enough to breed once every two to four years.

Rimu trees yielded an unusual abundance of their bright red fruits, rich in calcium and vitamin D, this year. The bumper crop ignited a kakapo mating frenzy, scientists said at the time.

When mating, the males settle on rocks or hilltops and inflate their air sacs to pump out a deep “boom” every few seconds that can be heard by females hundreds of feet away, scientists say. A female kakapo lays up to four eggs and raises its chicks alone. A kakapo’s lifespan can rival a human’s.

Kakapos were once widespread across New Zealand. But they were easy targets for the Maori, the first known humans in New Zealand, who arrived around the 13th century. The Maori gave the birds their name: a combination of the words for parrot (kaka) and night (po). The birds were hunted for meat and feathers, kept as pets, and became part of Maori folklore.

Another wave of arrivals in the 19th century, settlers from Europe, further threatened the species. They hunted the birds and introduced predators like ferrets and weasels, bringing kakapos to near extinction.

Then came serious efforts to save the kakapos. Starting in the 1980s, conservationists moved the birds to isolated offshore islands that lack predators such as cats, rats, and ferrets. They also gave the birds supplementary food like nuts and attached a small radio transmitter to each kakapo to track their activity.

Gradually, the kakapo population recovered, surpassing 200 in 2020. But the last time the population was thought to have exceeded 300 could have been as long as 75 years ago, the Department of Conservation said.

“There is still a long road of recovery ahead, but 90 chicks in a single season is a record,” said Deidre Vercoe, a conservationist focusing on the kakapo at the department. “In the early years of recovery, it took 16 years to produce that many chicks.”

Department scientists were optimistic they may not need to wait long for the next breeding season. Modeling indicated it could happen in 2028, they said.

CLEAR VIEW — The sky lightened behind the US Capitol after rainy weather on Wednesday in Washington.

Agents reassigned to study voter lists

Hundreds of federal agents from the Department of Homeland Security have been assigned to an intensive, week-long hunt for noncitizens among the nation's registered voters despite an absence of evidence of widespread fraud, according to documents and training videos reviewed by The New York Times.

Agents are scouring voter rolls managed by the states, and are using personally identifiable information about individual voters, such as their dates of birth and partial Social Security numbers, to look them up on those rolls, according to the documents.

In some cases, investigators are effectively posing as individual voters by plugging their names and personal information into public-facing websites run by the top election official in each state. Some of these sites declare that they are meant for individual use, potentially raising privacy concerns.

The extraordinary operation reveals the extent to which the Trump administration is searching for evidence of fraud before the November elections. The government is privately calling the effort the Unlawful Voter Initiative and is pulling agents from their normal duties, which include investigating such serious crimes as human trafficking and terrorism.

Given the decades of evidence showing how rare noncitizen voting is, it's unclear what the administration will discover, how verifiable any findings will be, and what President Trump or Homeland Security Secretary Markwayne Mullin plans to do with those findings. A database managed by the conservative Heritage Foundation identifies roughly 100 instances of noncitizen voting over a quarter-century. More recently, roughly 400 noncitizens — a tiny fraction of the electorate — voted in New Jersey after a software glitch led to their improper registration.

Trump has falsely claimed since his defeat in 2020 that fraud is epidemic in US elections. This year, he has focused heavily on noncitizen voting, regularly making unsubstantiated claims that hundreds of thousands of residents who are not citizens have registered to vote or have cast ballots.

So far, the administration has been unable to verify his claims, and has effectively admitted at times that its numbers have been overstated.

Yet the public repetition of falsehoods about election fraud has continued to sow doubt and distrust in the electoral process before a charged midterm election that will determine control of Congress.

'Blue' sculpture removed from Kennedy Center

The Kennedy Center took down a sculpture known as "Blue" Wednesday, the latest change to the cultural and performing arts center that stirred some pushback in President Trump's second term.

The sculpture, a tall, blue stick figure poised in action — as if to kick a ball or, from a different angle, having just kicked one — was designed by sculptor Joel Shapiro and installed in 2019.

The removal follows a longer-running saga with the Kennedy Center, where the Trump-aligned board is fighting in court for the right to plaster the president's name on the historic institution.

Shapiro, known for breathing life into otherwise minimalist stick figures, described "Blue" in a video posted to the Kennedy Center's YouTube years ago as being "about action and risk and performance and energy. It's a celebration of possibility."

Patagonia joins suit over shrinking of Bears Ears

WASHINGTON — Outdoor apparel company Patagonia joined conservation and tribal groups to sue President Trump on Wednesday, seeking to overturn his move to shrink Bears Ears National Monument in southern Utah by more than 1 million acres.

The lawsuit escalated Patagonia's feud with Trump, which began in the president's first term and became a core part of its corporate strategy.

Trump signed a proclamation in July that cut 91 percent of Bears Ears, an expanse of red-rock canyons rich with archaeologically significant sites, reducing its area by more than 1.2 million acres. He also shrank a second monument in southern Utah, Grand Staircase-Escalante, by nearly 1.7 million acres, or 90 percent.

The moves opened vast stretches of the desert landscape to oil drilling, uranium mining, and other development. Companies have already staked at least nine mining claims in areas that were removed from both monuments, records show.

But the suit argues that the law governing national monuments, the Antiquities Act of 1906, authorizes presidents to designate the sites but not to shrink them.

Ryan Gellert, CEO of Patagonia, said in an interview that it was a "difficult time" for businesses to stand up to Trump. But, he said, pushback "is more needed now than ever, and I think that this administration, for the 19 or 20 months that they've been in office, has been super intent on deploying a whole-of-government attack on nature and the natural world."

New twist in case of soldier held by Taliban

Court: Tossing out Bergdahl's conviction error

By Michael Levenson

NEW YORK TIMES

A federal appeals court on Tuesday found that a judge lacked jurisdiction when he wiped out the conviction of Bowe Bergdahl, a former Army sergeant who walked off a base in Afghanistan in 2009 and was captured by the Taliban.

The decision by a three-judge panel of the US Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit effectively reinstates Bergdahl's punishment, including his dishonorable discharge from the military in 2017, Bergdahl's lawyer, Eugene R. Fidell, said in an interview.

"Obviously, we are disappointed by the outcome," Fidell said. "This entire controversy has lasted a very long time. But it continues to be an important case, not only for Sergeant Bergdahl but for the integrity of the military justice system."

The Justice Department did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Fidell said Bergdahl had the right to ask for a rehearing before the same three-judge panel, or to seek a review by the entire appeals court or the US Supreme Court. "In the coming days," he said, "we are going to give very close attention to our future course of action."

The ruling represents the latest setback for Bergdahl, 40, an Idaho native. His action in 2009 led to an extensive search-and-rescue mission, during which US troops were injured.

An Army investigation concluded in 2015 that Bergdahl had intended to hike to another military post and report perceived wrongdoing in his unit. But he was captured by militants hours later, and was held for five years.

A sanity board later found that he had been suffering from a "severe mental disease or defect" at the time.

In 2014, President Barack Obama secured Bergdahl's freedom in exchange for sending five Taliban detainees held at the US military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, to Qatar. Obama appeared alongside Bergdahl's parents in the Rose Garden. The national security adviser at the time, Susan Rice, later praised Bergdahl for serving with "honor and distinction."

Former soldiers then came forward to describe the circumstances of the sergeant's capture, accusing him of desertion. Republicans seized on those accounts to contend that the prisoner swap had not been worth it.

Donald Trump railed against Bergdahl during his first campaign for the White House in 2016, calling him a "traitor" and a "piece of garbage" who "deserved the death penalty."

Bergdahl, who had been kept in brutal conditions and tortured during his five years in captivity, pleaded guilty in a military court in 2017 to desertion and to endangering the US troops sent to search for him.

The military judge in that case, Colonel Jeffery Nance of the Army, ordered that Bergdahl be dishonorably discharged, rejecting a 14-year prison sentence requested by the prosecution.

The judge also reduced Bergdahl's rank to private and required him to forfeit $1,000 a month of his pay for 10 months.

While the defense had told Nance that a sentence of dishonorable discharge would be appropriate, Fidell had said at the time that he hoped that it would be overturned.

Such a discharge, he added, would deprive his client of health care and other "benefits he badly needs" from the Department of Veterans Affairs.

In 2023, Judge Reggie B. Walton of US District Court for the District of Columbia threw out all orders and rulings by Nance after Oct. 16, 2017, the date Nance submitted an application to the Justice Department to become an immigration judge in the Trump administration.

Walton found that Nance had not disclosed the application while he was presiding over Bergdahl's case, raising the appearance of potential bias.

The government appealed Walton's decision, and on Tuesday, the appeals court panel found that Walton lacked the authority to vacate Bergdahl's conviction and sentence.

Jurors find Tompkins not guilty of corruption charges

►TOMPKINS

"I'm feeling really good."

Tompkins thanked God, his legal team, and the jury.

"I'm glad that they saw the fallacy of this case," he said. "What I was accused of, I did not do."

The case offered a glimpse of behind-the-scenes wheeling-and-dealing of power brokers in Greater Boston. The prosecution's star witness was Frank Perullo, a cofounder of Ascend who had made his bones locally as political consultant and lobbyist.

Tompkins, a well-known and glad-handing presence on Boston's political scene, has as sheriff run the Nashua Street Jail and the South Bay House of Correction for years. Charged with housing and caring for the incarcerated as a public servant, Tompkins found himself facing the prospect of spending time on the other side of the bars after the federal indictment came down last summer.

The exhibits shown in court over the week-and-a-half-long trial included text exchanges between Tompkins and Perullo, who were once friends. Some exchanges included Tompkins inquiring about when he would claw back portions of his investment in Ascend. Others included jokey banter and expressions of affection between the two. They messaged about grabbing lunch and campaign merchandise.

To obtain a cannabis license in Massachusetts, businesses must lay out plans to promote diversity and to invest in individuals and communities disproportionately affected by previous cannabis prohibitions. In Ascend's case, prosecutors argued the company met its "positive impact" requirement through a partnership with Tompkins on a program to train and hire people recently released from jail.

And that partnership allegedly gave Tompkins leverage; without it, according to prosecutors, company officials feared they would not have their license renewed to operate a dispensary downtown.

Tompkins had not signed any agreement that would have guaranteed a refund on his initial investment, according to the indictment, but an Ascend cofounder paid him back anyway after the stock dipped.

"Sheriff Tompkins got something that nobody else got: a full refund," federal prosecutor Lauren Maynard told the jury during closing arguments.

Maynard told jurors they got a "peek behind the curtain" of what corruption looks like.

"He uses his power, he uses his official position to get what he wants," she said.

But Tompkins's defense team argued the jail program was not a make-or-break deal for Ascend, saying the company had other measures that would have satisfied the necessary "positive impact" requirements.

Tompkins's close friend and former boss Andrea Cabral, a former Massachusetts public safety secretary, testified to that earlier in the week. Cabral, a former executive with Ascend, said that if the partnership with "What I was accused of, I did not do," Sheriff Steven W. Tompkins said Wednesday. He has run the Nashua Street Jail and the South Bay House of Correction for years.

Tompkins's sheriff's department was withdrawn, it would not have risked Ascend's state applications.

"Witness after witness told you there was never a risk to the licenses," said Tompkins's defense attorney Martin G. Weinberg during closing arguments.

Additionally, the sheriff's defense lawyers attacked the credibility and trustworthiness of Perullo, a longtime political mover-and-shaker. They argued the prosecution's case hinged on Perullo's testimony, which they labeled "uncorroborated."

Previously in the trial, Weinberg had portrayed Perullo as having "negotiated a cynical exchange" with federal authorities to avoid prosecution.

During witness testimony, Perullo said he was worried that if the plug was pulled on the Suffolk sheriff's inmate reentry partnership with Ascend, it would mean further delays in getting his retail operation off the ground, possibly slowing the permitting process and complicating the company's progress on an initial public offering.

Perullo also said he didn't think the Ascend stock deal with Tompkins "was right."

"I had never been asked for something that was directly tied to a government action," said Perullo under oath.

But Weinberg argued that there was no quid pro quo, that Tompkins "never exchanged a benefit."

"He did nothing wrong," he said of Tompkins. "He's not an extortionist."

The jury concurred with that assessment.

Tompkins faced two counts of extortion. One was tethered to a fear of economic harm. The second was extortion under color of official right, which alleged Tompkins obtained something he knew he was not legally entitled to in return for official acts, prosecutors said.

After the verdict, Weinberg said the jury got it right.

Tompkins, he said, "has his life back."

"And the people of Suffolk County got their sheriff back."

After his indictment last year, Tompkins said he would go on leave and designated Mark Lawhorne as the "special sheriff" who would fill his seat on an interim basis.

A spokesperson for Tompkins said he plans to resume his duties as sheriff.

He will come back to an agency battered by scandal unrelated to his federal court case.

Earlier this summer, the state's office of the chief medical examiner ruled that the death of an inmate following a fight with staff at the South Bay House of Correction late last year was a homicide. No criminal charges have been filed in connection with that case.

Separately, a Suffolk County sheriff's correction officer was arrested last year for allegedly trafficking methamphetamine. Another employee was fired last year for allegedly smuggling hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of a synthetic cannabinoid to an inmate.

In another case filed last year, a former Suffolk correction officer was accused of raping an inmate. He pleaded not guilty. The case is ongoing, with a jury trial slated for later this month.

Markey’s win reflects progressive dominance

►SENATE

in the process, Markey staked out a staunch position — vocally backing a Massachusetts law that protects transgender student athletes — that other Democrats have avoided.

“I ran on Medicare for All. I ran on the Green New Deal. I ran on taxing millionaires and billionaires. I ran on slashing the defense budget,” Markey said at a post-primary event in Malden on Wednesday. “Massachusetts sent a resounding message that a progressive vision is the correct message for the voters of not only Massachusetts but for our country.

“That,” Markey said, “is the winning message in 2026.”

Taken together with Markey’s campaign alliances with national figures like Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders and New York Representative Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez, the playbook looks similar to how Markey weathered a reelection challenge from Joe Kennedy III in 2020.

This time, however, the success of Markey’s progressive strategy helped him buck a national trend that claimed some of his congressional colleagues: At least seven other Democratic incumbents lost their seats this year amid a party-wide reckoning over aging leadership. And it comes months before Democratic presidential hopefuls begin kicking off their campaigns to court the party faithful — making it a potential late barometer that voters are looking more for progressive bona fides than merely new faces.

At Markey’s primary night party Tuesday, few attendees spoke of his 50-year-long career in Washington. Instead, they lauded his efforts to protect abortion rights, his vocal support for immigrants, and his commitment to the LGBTQ community.

To the uninitiated, they could have been talking about any progressive Democrat, 80 years old or otherwise.

Markey’s win was an “exclamation point” on a 2026 primary season that showed “progressives are the dominant political force within the Democratic Party,” said Joseph Geevarghese, executive director of Our Revolution, a leading grassroots progressive group that backed the senator.

The result, he added, “captures how hungry the grass roots are for transformational change.”

“If you want to run for president and win the nomination in 2028, you’ve got to be a bold progressive,” Geevarghese said. “I don’t think there’s any other way to be competitive.”

DANIELLE PARHIZKARAN/GLOBE STAFF

Tuesday night was a happy one for Senator Ed Markey and his supporters as they celebrated in Boston.

Progressive backers of Markey emphasized how the senator’s case was broader than simply putting up vehement opposition to Trump — a strategy he shared with other successful upstarts in this primary season. Moulton tried to burnish his credentials with the base by arguing he would be tougher on Trump than Markey, and critiqued him for voting for some Trump appointees.

In Massachusetts and elsewhere, “candidates pushing for big structural changes and channeling anger not just about Donald Trump but about the broader state of the economy performed pretty well despite being massively outspent,” said Dan Geldon, a longtime top adviser to Senator Elizabeth Warren. Warren, too, was a key early Markey endorser.

“In the presidential context, big money interests will have a ton of sway as they always do, but it’s obvious from the past year that Democratic voters don’t think things are going well or that Trump is the only problem,” he said.

Of course, Markey’s unabashedly progressive campaign wasn’t the only factor behind trouncing Moulton across nearly every corner of the state. The senator’s 30-percentage point margin of victory was in line with late polls of the primary, which had increasingly begun to point to a Markey blow-out — not a tighter race that seemed to be unfolding earlier in the summer.

The 47-year-old Moulton staked his campaign on a confidence that primary voters would fire Markey simply for being too old. He claimed to be just as progressive as the senator — but that rang hollow after years of positioning himself as a pragmatic, center-left voice of reason within the party.

His increasingly pointed attacks on Markey, such as suggesting he was implicated in the Epstein files, not only turned off voters but underscored the lack of a strong, cohesive idea behind his campaign aside from “generational change.”

Rachel Ramirez, a stay-at-home mom from Lynn, said at a polling place on Tuesday that she voted for Markey because his interest in policies that support families and immigrants outweighs any concerns about his age.

“Regardless of age,” she said, “you have to vote for people who align with your values.”

Even those who voted for Moulton did not take much issue with Markey’s progressive platform, nor did they express broader concerns about the party moving left.

While Markey “has done a good job for a very long time, it’s time for a change,” Sarah Almer, 50, said at a Cambridge polling place Tuesday.

Still, Tuesday was a good night for incumbents in Massachusetts, not just progressives. US representatives Richard E. Neal and Stephen F. Lynch, on the South Coast, Healey said she believes that “Trump is on the ballot this year,” and that residents should worry about the president, even if he is barred from seeking a third term in the White House and will, literally speaking, not appear next to her name in November.

“You have somebody as president right now who is doing things that directly hurt the residents and the economy of Massachusetts and our businesses, and we need to make sure that there’s leadership always coming out of the corner office that’s going to protect our state,” she said.

It’s a message Healey has repeatedly hit on this year in major speeches, in which she’s framed Trump as the cause of the state’s woes. The president, she said Tuesday night, is “raising your costs, he’s terrorizing our communities, he’s taking away your health care and your rights.”

And Healey leaned further into Trump on Wednesday by spending the first day of her general election campaign in Fall River, which in 2024 voted Republican for the first time in roughly a century, helping illustrate the region’s shift into a political hotbed for Republicans.

State Senator Michael Rodrigues, the chamber’s powerful budget chief and a Democrat from nearby Westport, downplayed Fall River’s lurch right, but said Healey is nonetheless right to not take its voters “for granted.”

“The fact that a little minored wave swept over Bristol County a couple years ago, I don’t think that will be repeated,” Rodrigues told the Globe.

Minogue, who has tapped his vast wealth to rise from political obscurity to help lead the GOP ticket, said Healey’s focus on Trump helps her “not talk about her failed four years of leadership and management.”

The former executive of a medical device company, Minogue has leaned heavily on his private-sector and military experience in his stump speeches, and said Wednesday that he is better suited to be governor because he has plans — albeit largely undefined ones — he said would make life affordable in Massachusetts.

“She needs to focus on solving the problems, not campaigning on them,” Minogue said of Healey.

Though Minogue and Healey have offered broad outlines of what they hope to accomplish if elected in November, they have selected in offered specifics on the campaign trail.

Minogue released a health care plan this summer focused largely on increasing access to primary care and lowering insurance costs. And Healey’s campaign aides have argued she has a record of seeking ways to make life better for residents, be it pushing for zoning reforms to increase housing construction or proposing to cap the resale price of event tickets.

Pressed to name her second-term priorities Wednesday, Healey stuck to sweeping statements — building more housing, growing the economy, and investing in transportation. She pointed to, among other things, signing a law to make community college tuition-free.

“There’s a lot that we’ve got planned,” she said. “There’s a lot we want to work on.”

She then turned back to Trump.

“To be clear, Trump is on the ballot, and I’ll tell you why: Every single day, the actions taken by the Trump administration hurt people around the country, hurt people in Massachusetts,” she said.

Costas Panagopoulos, a Northeastern University political science professor, said it benefits Healey to keep the attention on Trump because many voters’ decisions in November will come down to how they feel about President Trump and current political and economic conditions.”

But eventually, he said, voters will want to hear something more.

“It may not be sufficient to just go after Trump, but to make the case for what she’s done for Massachusetts since being elected, and perhaps equally as important, what she plans to do looking forward,” Panagopoulos said. “Politicians sometimes forget that voters are looking for something to vote for — and not simply something or someone to vote against.”

Minogue said that if elected governor, he would audit the state’s $63 billion state budget to find “fraud, waste, and excess” and, he said, give money back to taxpayers.

He also said he wants to bring in more natural gas from Connecticut, New York, and Pennsylvania and boost the state’s reliance on nuclear energy to lower utility bills.

But he left the details out for now.

“I’ll give you more information . . . the next time we get together,” he said.

Drought: As the region’s water resources become more stressed, we need a shift in mind-set Massachusetts is in a drought. This may not a Western-state style drought with tumbleweeds rolling across the desert, but make no mistake: The Commonwealth is running low on water. Lower-than-normal rain totals are stressing reservoirs and groundwater resources, creating conditions that are expected to get worse as climate change brings hotter and drier summers to the region.

New England is warming more quickly than most of the planet. A study released last year found that average temperatures in the Northeast have increased by about 4.5 degrees Fahrenheit since 1900. As temperatures rise, moisture evaporates more quickly from the ground, lakes, and reservoirs, exacerbating drought conditions.

On Aug. 7, the Massachusetts Executive Office of Energy and Environmental Affairs listed five regions in Massachusetts as being in “significant drought,” while the Southeast region of the state is in a “mild drought.” Western Massachusetts and Martha’s Vineyard are no longer experiencing drought after above-average rainfall in July.

If more sustained rain doesn’t fall soon, Greater Boston, as well as much of coastal southern New England, face the very real risk of some wells running dry. Dry conditions also put pressure on farms, as well as our home gardens and lawns, while increasing the risk of brush fires. Low lakes, streams, and rivers place stress on fish and other aquatic life.

Adapting to our new reality will require a shift in planning and our cultural mind-set.

“It can be hard to get your head around the idea that the state is in fact in a drought. Massachusetts is historically a water-rich state. It’s a riverine state, we’ve got a lot of water around us,” Dave McGlinchey, executive director of the Massachusetts Rivers Alliance, told the editorial board.

While our foliage largely appears lush and green, that doesn’t change the fact that water resources are running low. McGlinchey said today’s drought challenge is “really a stewardship and conservation issue,” deciding how best to draw down and allocate diminishing water resources.

Today’s drought may seem like a paradox in some places. Consider households near the Quabbin Reservoir in Central Massachusetts, which supplies drinking water for Greater Boston but not to nearby residents. Many homes near the reservoir rely on wells that are drying up. If droughts exacerbate, more resources and perhaps new water delivery systems will need to be added to help these communities.

While historically rare, drought is not new to Massachusetts. The state reached the equivalent of a drought emergency in the 1960s. What is new, however, is the dramatic increase in frequency of drought declarations agement Task Force’s role, giving it permanence and establishing a funding pathway to deal with a shifting climate. It’s a science-driven, regional approach to managing ongoing droughts. The Legislature should get this to the governor’s desk.

Even if the region gets some good soaks, it will take a steady, persistent pattern of rain to bring us back to normal conditions. Dry, hard soil can’t absorb rainfall as quickly, which leads to water runoff. Flash floods are also more likely under dry conditions.

To be clear, New England is not facing a Mad Max-style reckoning where people risk going thirsty. Our reservoir system has been largely well run. But think of a full reservoir like a savings account — it’s there when you need it for drinking, washing, fire protection, running businesses, and protecting the environment.

The more pressing worries surround the region’s smaller streams, ponds, local groundwater supplies, and wells, which are stressed.

“I don’t think we’re at the point where we need to revamp our entire water supply,” Vandana Rao, director of water policy at the Massachusetts Executive Office of Energy and Environmental Affairs, told the editorial board. But she also stressed the need for continued conservation measures.

That includes actions on a larger scale, such as more wastewater reuse and continuing to replace old, possibly leaky, pipes and infrastructure that deliver water to cities and towns. Those improvements also depend on federal investment, however, which the Trump administration has proposed cutting.

Within the home, the state recommends that residents conserve water during what is now being classified as a Level 2 — Significant Drought. Steps include limiting outdoor watering to hoses and watering cans in the morning and evening hours, when water doesn’t evaporate as quickly, and limiting planting of new landscape. Also, repair leaks, run only a full dishwasher, and shorten showers.

These steps may seem insignificant or even unnecessary. Only precipitation can end a drought. But collective steps to save water along the way can help it end more quickly, and also help avoid the need for punitive steps to restrict water usage, which nobody wants to see.

in recent years, reaching those levels in nine of the past 11 years.

“As of August 23, Boston has experienced its sixth-driest year on record,” said the Globe’s meteorologist Ken Mahan, citing data from the Northeast Regional Climate Center that extends back to 1872.

The Senate is preparing for this new reality by introducing language within its environmental bill, the “Mass Ready Act,” calling for the state’s Drought Management Task Force to update its management plan. Despite 46 cosponsors promoting similar legislation, the House did not advance the issue in its version of an environmental bill.

The Senate’s language does not create new layers of bureaucracy or oversight agencies — it simply brings clarity, closes loopholes, and codifies the Drought Man-

The NFL has a role in a better future for youth football

By Stephen Lane

Stephen Lane is the author of “Long Run to Glory,” and “No Sanctuary.”

A recent study in the British Medical Journal found that one-quarter of former NFL players who died between 2016 and 2021 had a degenerative neurological disorder: CTE, or chronic traumatic encephalopathy. For comparison, a study in the journal Brain Pathology found that the incidence of CTE among those who didn’t play any sports is roughly 3 percent.

It’s doubtful this latest study will force any kind of reckoning in the NFL. Measured by per-game viewership, the league’s popularity is greater than that of the other major American sports combined. Football, as firmly entrenched in the national cultural landscape as it is possible to be, isn’t going anywhere — at least, not anytime soon.

However, it is time to reconsider scholastic football. To the extent that schools exist to help students stretch and develop their minds, football’s elevated risk of brain trauma runs counter to that mission.

It may feel a little nanny-state-ish to cancel football; other activities carry significantly elevated risks as well — riding bicycles, for example, results in more than 1,000 fatalities and 80,000 head injuries per year. If students (or their parents) have misgivings about football, they can simply not play. If other kids do want to participate, maybe they should have that choice.

But schools don’t need to be party to it.

Yes, the argument goes, football teaches certain skills: perseverance, toughness, teamwork, grit, sacrifice. But athletes in other sports learn those same lessons, as do students in the cast of a play, or on the robotics team, or in the orchestra. Football is not a unique or special teaching tool.

It is uniquely risky. Even prior to this latest study, research already pointed to the harm football can do to athletes whose brains are still developing. The study in Brain Pathology found that even athletes who never played football beyond high school showed a markedly elevated risk of CTE. Despite this mounting evidence, school leaders aren’t pushing to get rid of football. Schools make significant changes the way a supertanker changes direction: slowly. When schools do pivot quickly, it’s typically in response to direct pressure from their local communities — in particular, from parents. But the high school game, just like its professional cousin, occupies hallowed cultural ground in many communities — “Friday Night Lights” and all that.

The best hope for getting football out of schools is a gradual, amicable separation. A few enterprising coaches start up private club football programs, and a virtuous cycle begins: More athletes choose private football clubs, so fewer high schools can support teams, which causes more athletes to migrate to club programs.

For players and coaches, a club system would create more flexibility. Athletes could choose their club, instead of being stuck with their high school offerings; coaches could build programs with athletes from multiple towns. And athletes and coaches could choose their level: Some clubs might operate essentially as feeder programs for the pros (which, with the possible exception of UMass, is what Division 1 college football has become), while other clubs might play on a more recreational level.

The club model isn’t perfect. Some club sports — think AAU basketball — seem to suffer from an “anything goes” mentality. A sport with as much physical risk as football would require strong regulation and governance. Further, youth sports in the United States already has a pay-for-play problem, one that has created inequitable barriers to participation.

Making the club model work would require a partner with strong, top-down organization, nationwide reach, and vast resources, as well as a vested interest in promoting the sport. Enter the NFL. The league is perfectly positioned to help build a well-regulated club system; in fact, it’s already edging its way into the youth game.

A complete overhaul of club football wouldn’t be a simple task. The landscape of youth football, like that of nearly every other youth sport, is a littered patchwork of local fiefdoms, the rulers of which wouldn’t easily cede control. But if any organization has the resources to effect a takeover, it is the NFL.

The sport would be better off: A nationwide, NFL-run club system could offer a wider range of opportunities for players of all ages, genders, and abilities. The league prints money, and could ensure that every athlete has access to a high-quality club program, no matter their economic circumstances. The NFL would also benefit: The league could use the youth system to promote its brand to the next generation of fans.

A club-based program wouldn’t necessarily reduce the risk of CTE to its players. Football is a full-speed, full-collision sport, and can’t be made truly safe without fundamentally altering that essence. Yet despite that risk, football retains its primeval allure. Americans aren’t ready to give up their football, and maybe they shouldn’t have to. But schools are better off without it.

Crime and compassion

Lindsay Clancy, Latarsha Sanders cases get vastly different public attention

I have been reflecting on the public response to Lindsay Clancy and her murder trial with compassion and unease. If Clancy was experiencing severe postpartum mental illness, we should ask whether our mental health system failed her. We can hold that truth alongside the unimaginable harm done to her children. But where is that same compassion for low-income Black and brown mothers?

Globe columnist Yvonne Abraham has compared Clancy's case with that of Latarsha Sanders, a Black mother from Brockton who killed her two youngest children and was recently granted a new trial, noting the striking similarities between their cases and the vastly different public attention they received. That difference should make us examine how race and class shape whose suffering we understand.

As a family defense lawyer, I see another side of this disparity. The state Department of Children and Families investigates Massachusetts parents, and children are removed from loving homes under circumstances rooted in poverty: unstable housing, lack of child care, food insecurity, or inadequate resources.

When DCF removes a child, the trauma is profound. A loving mother can lose her child for months or years, sometimes permanently. Yet there is rarely a public outcry. Rarely do we ask whether that family needed support rather than separation. Why is that scrutiny harder to extend to Black and brown families?

Clancy deserves compassion. So does every mother, not only those whose pain the public finds most relatable.

The village new mothers need should form long before the baby comes

Re “Clancy case should force us to ask: Who cares for new mothers?” by Tina Cassidy (Opinion, Aug. 26): My mother had eight children, a friend's mother had 10 children, and another friend's mother had five children. My siblings and I would be outside playing and sometimes we'd come in and play with the baby. This was in the late 1950s and early '60s.

I don't remember my mother's friends coming by to help. What I do remember is that quite often neighbors would come by and visit — they all did, all of the time, and it was routine for my mother to go and visit a neighbor.

Where I live now, neighbors do this. Some call first, others drop by with a beer or coffee in hand to sit and visit. The thing is that people should be doing this from the start — they should go and meet new neighbors when they move in and visit later. When babies come, they will already have a network. Why wait for a baby to interact with folks?

Becca Collins, as Cinderella, and Brett Holland, as the Mad Hatter, prepared to greet visitors at Story Land.

Where Cinderella fits in the news of the day

Feel-good feature brings a smile

Every morning, as I glance at the paper, I find confirmation for my secret theory: The Boston Globe is deliberately keeping the president's face off the front page. I can only assume that the paper, in its own way, is helping readers balance tenuous global events with local human-interest stories.

Imagine my delight when the front page on Aug. 28 featured Celine Hijazi's story “More than a job, it's their crowning moment: At Story Land, being Cinderella isn't just a case of having the right slipper.” Nostalgia immediately took me back to my part-time summer jobs at Story Land in the 1970s and brought a smile to my face.

I hope my assumption is correct and that the Globe continues to favor these uplifting features over political portraits. Kudos for running stories that make us smile — even if Story Land never did offer me that Cinderella role.

JAYME IERNA

Combo of Story Land feature, Clancy story makes for a fractured fairy tale

While my (however whispering) logical side understands that newspaper front pages must entice potential newsstand buyers, I was still struck by the juxtaposition in the Aug. 28 edition of a huge photo of a wide-eyed Cinderella at Story Land placed next to that day's headline in the ongoing Lindsay Clancy murder trial (“Outcome of Clancy case still uncertain”).

Perhaps, in the case of the Story Land story, it was the creepy cropping out of the princess's mouth that awoke the sleeping alarmist in me or the inset image of a little girl being embraced by the once-abused monarch (with the caption explaining that the actors who play Cinderella “have to be ready for all kinds of children”).

The Story Land headline even sent me ruminating on motherhood (rather than the theme park gig) as “more than just a job, it's their crowning moment.”

Between the gravity of the narrative of Clancy's case and the levity of the Cinderella spread, it seemed as if the Globe had been laid out by the Brothers Grimm.

Seth Moulton's missteps: Why he lost to Ed Markey

Around 5 p.m. on primary day, I ran into Representative Seth Moulton at the polling station where I vote. When I asked if he would have changed anything about his campaign for US Senate if he could have done it over again, he said: “I'm sure there are things that I could have done differently along the way, but I'm very proud of the campaign that we've run, the team that we've built, and the values that we hold.”

It's routine for candidates to say they are proud of their campaign. But I hope Moulton — who lost badly to Senator Ed Markey in the Democratic primary — does think about what he might have done differently. If he ever runs for office again — and I hope he does — he should do it in a way that's truer to his own beliefs.

In the run against Markey, who is 80, Moulton, who is 47, tried to make the fight strictly about age, while insisting there were no differences between the two on policy and ideology. Progressives were never going to buy that, especially with Markey making sure they would not forget that Moulton, as Markey put it, threw “trans kids under the bus.” But it was also no way to sell himself to voters who might actually have been looking for something different, not just for someone younger.

Moulton needed to package that difference in a much different way.

He could never get past the remarks he made after the 2024 presidential election, when he said, “I have two little girls, I don't want them getting run over on a playing field by a male or formerly male athlete, but as a Democrat I'm supposed to be afraid to say that.” There has to be a better way than that to debate the issue of transgender athletes. Markey skillfully turned Moulton's words into a “human rights” issue, as he told The New York Times.

In his Senate run, Moulton barely mentioned the compelling story that first won him election to Congress in 2014 — that of a Harvard graduate who joined the Marine Corps and earned a Bronze Star with valor for his leadership during the war in Iraq. After the war, he also aided Afghans who helped the US government and were trying to flee the Taliban.

He should have done more to highlight his service, and with it, Markey's vote to authorize the Iraq War when he was a member of the House of Representatives. During their debates Moulton tried to do that, but he never struck the right chord.

Instead, Moulton was defined simply as the overly ambitious, “young man in a hurry,” as the Times put it, who upset Democratic Party leadership with misguided efforts such as trying to oust House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

Moulton's effort to link Markey to Jeffrey Epstein during their second debate was also a mistake. During the debate, Markey called it “reprehensible” and afterward, the Markey campaign denied the tenuous allegation that Markey met with a lobbyist who was supposedly working on Epstein's behalf. Without further evidence, the attack looked cheap and took away any momentum Moulton might have had in making the case for generational change.

There was nothing subtle about that pitch. A Moulton ad featuring former Massachusetts secretary of state Michael Connolly wrapped up with the sentiment, “People shouldn't stay in Washington too long. It's bad for your health.”

It's remarkable that Markey sold himself to Democratic primary voters as the voice of the next generation.

Technically, Markey still has to win a general election against Republican John Deaton, but it's hard to imagine him losing that contest.

If he wins, as expected, will he serve a full term that would end with him age 86?

Markey has said he would resign if he felt unable to serve.

Would he also step aside to pave the way for a younger progressive protégé? That's already a source of speculation and gossip.

Markey should have retired at the end of this term and left it to the younger generation of Massachusetts Democrats to fight for his Senate seat. That would have been a real battle over ideas, not over age. The most progressive candidate might still have won, but there could have been a robust debate over something more important than date of birth.

Moulton was right about the need to pass the torch. He deserves credit for his willingness to challenge Markey and put him to the test.

And Markey was also right when it came to understanding that voters needed something more than age to convince them now was the time to do so.

Moulton failed to do that. Now, he will have plenty of time to think about why.

How Democrats could lose a Senate seat in N.H.

By Kristin Tate

Kristin Tate is a Republican political strategist and contributor at Sky News. Her latest book is “The Liberal Invasion of Red State America.”

If this were an ordinary midterm election, Republican Senate candidate John E. Sununu of New Hampshire would probably be in trouble. President Trump's approval rating in the state had fallen to 37 percent as of July, with 62 percent disapproving. Nearly two-thirds of Granite Staters said going to war with Iran was the wrong decision in a poll published in June. Also as of June, Democrats held a 10-point advantage on the generic congressional ballot. Nationally, Trump's approval has fallen to 33 percent, while Democrats enjoy a substantially greater enthusiasm advantage heading into November.

Sununu and Representative Chris Pappas, a Democrat, are vying to succeed Senator Jeanne Shaheen, who is not seeking reelection. This is not a political environment in which Republicans should be dreaming about flipping a Senate seat in New England. And yet Sununu might do exactly that. The latest poll has him narrowly leading Pappas, 45 percent to 43 percent. His strategy offers a lesson for the party in hostile territory: Localize yourself and nationalize the Democrat.

Sununu has little incentive to spend the next two months defending every decision made by a Republican president whom most Granite Staters dislike. Trump has endorsed him, but the former senator has not turned that endorsement into the organizing principle of his campaign. Most notably, he has broken with the president on the war in Iran. He has also criticized tariffs on imported building materials amid New Hampshire's housing crunch.

The message to voters is straightforward. They may dislike Trump and the GOP in Washington but neither is on the ballot. Sununu is.

Meanwhile, he is trying to nationalize Pappas by tying him to the most unpopular figures and excesses of the Democratic Party. Conservatives have taken to calling the Democrat “Pajama Boy” Pappas, a reference to the infamous Obamacare promo graphic featuring a grown man in a plaid onesie and hipster glasses clutching a mug.

The nickname is funny but purposeful. Republicans want voters to see Pappas less as a familiar congressman and more as a product of the Democratic Party of Washington and the activist left. The national Democratic Party has spent much of the past decade drifting away from the sensibilities of moderates.

Its most visible figures have championed lax immigration enforcement, flirted with eliminating private health insurance, embraced trans athletes competing in women's sports, and embraced criminal justice policies that voters came to associate with disorder and weak enforcement. Some of its rising stars call themselves democratic socialists.

Pappas is not New York City Mayor Zohran Mamdani, but Republicans are trying to make it harder for voters to separate him from the wing of the party Mamdani represents. Democrats, of course, are attempting the same maneuver. They want every vote for Sununu to look like a vote for Trump. But Sununu has decades of history working in his favor. Voters already know what the Sununu name stands for.

His father was governor, his brother Chris was governor, and John himself represented the state in both the House and Senate. In most states, political dynasties can feel like relics or exercises in entitlement, but in a small state like New Hampshire, familiarity can work differently. The Sununu name carries a political identity independent of the national Republican Party.

Granite Staters have repeatedly demonstrated a willingness to split their political personalities. Kamala Harris carried New Hampshire in 2024, but on the same ballot voters elected Republican Kelly Ayotte governor. Chris Sununu won four gubernatorial elections even as New Hampshire leaned Democratic in federal races. Voters in the state are accustomed to liking a local Republican while disliking the national GOP.

New England once had a thriving tradition of locally rooted Republicanism. Massachusetts elected Republican governors for 24 of the 32 years between 1991 and 2023. Vermont elected Republicans, Maine still does, and New Hampshire has repeatedly done so. They succeeded because voters saw them less as avatars of a national political movement than as governors, senators, and neighbors.

Modern politics has turned even local races into referendums on the national parties. Every election becomes Trump versus the Democrats, and every candidate is expected to answer for the most extreme members of their party.

A Sununu victory would offer Republicans a path back to relevance in New England that may not require persuading the region to love the national GOP.

It may simply require giving voters permission to ignore it.

gave nothing away. Sullivan sent them back to continue deliberations, along with a print-out of the instructions for each. Two hours later, when he dismissed jurors for the day, Sullivan said, “Thank you for your time and commitment.”

It was the second time they alerted the judge they were unable to reach a unanimous verdict, following one Tuesday morning. But it was the first time the judge had issued the formal Tuey-Rodriguez instructions.

Outside the courthouse Wednesday, Clancy’s attorney, Kevin Reddington, said that if jurors come back a third time saying they still can’t reach a verdict, the judge may use the Tuey-Rodriguez charge again to urge them to continue.

But, ultimately, it’s up to jurors whether they are deadlocked or want to continue to keep trying to reach a unanimous verdict.

“We thought it was the end of the road today and they still are working hard,” Reddington said.

If there is a mistrial, he said, “We’re ready to retry it next week.”

Over five weeks of testimony, jurors were tasked with considering complex legal questions at the intersection of mental health and criminal justice. They’ve also been presented with extensive medical and pharmaceutical data — all viewed through the prism of a heartbreaking reality: the deaths of three children at the

Those factors raise the possibility that jurors could find themselves split on a wide variety of issues.

Jurors were reminded that the burden is on the prosecution to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt.

The Tuey-Rodriguez charge is generally given only once before a mistrial is declared, said Thomas Drechsler, a recently retired Superior Court judge. But “there’s always some discretion” maintained by the judge, who “might in response to a certain line of inquiry fashion some sort of instruction” to aid in continued deliberations.

What is unclear is how far Sullivan can and will push the jury to continue on.

Retired Massachusetts Superior Court judge Christopher J. Muse, who teaches trial practice at Boston College’s law school, said the judge will have to weigh whether he believes the jury is truly deadlocked.

GREG DERR/THE PATRIOT LEDGER/POOL

Lindsay Clancy reacted in court Wednesday to the news that a woman had been arrested for recording images of jurors leaving the courthouse.

In an email Wednesday evening, he said, “The rule, statute and case law requires a judge to discharge a jury that has twice declared deadlock, provided, there was a determination that it was ‘deadlocked jury’ after ‘due and thorough consideration.’ ”

“However,” Muse added, “in a non coercive manner a judge may inquire if further deliberations may be helpful, then the jury can ‘consent’ to do so.”

Here, the central question before the jury is whether Clancy, 36, should be held criminally responsible for the deaths of her children, 5-year-old Cora, 3-year-old Dawson, and 8-month-old Callan. She’s charged with three counts of first-degree murder.

Prosecutors have argued she knew that what she was doing was wrong when she strangled them with exercise bands in the basement of the family’s Duxbury home in January 2023. She then slashed her neck and wrists and jumped out a second-story window, a suicide attempt that left her paralyzed from the waist down.

However, Clancy has asserted what’s commonly called an insanity defense, alleging she was experiencing postpartum psychosis after a slew of psychiatric providers failed to properly diagnose and treat her deteriorating mental health in the months leading up to the killings. She has said she heard a man’s voice in her head telling her to kill her children and herself.

Under Massachusetts law, a defendant cannot be held criminally responsible for their actions if she was suffering from a “mental disease or defect” that left her unable to appreciate the wrongfulness of her actions to a moral certainty, or unable to conform them to the law. The burden is on prosecutors to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Clancy is criminally responsible.

The choices before jurors are whether Clancy is not guilty, not guilty by lack of criminal responsibility, or guilty of first-degree murder, second-degree murder, or manslaughter.

If jurors remain hopelessly deadlocked, the judge can declare a mistrial, which would end the trial — but not the prosecution. Reddington said he expects Plymouth District Attorney Timothy J. Cruz will seek to retry the case; prosecutors also have the option to bring lesser charges, such as second-degree murder or manslaughter.

“If you are left in doubt of any element of the crime, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of the doubt and must be acquitted,” Sullivan told the jury Wednesday, reading the Tuey-Rodriguez instructions. “However, in conferring together, you ought to pay proper respect to each other’s opinions and listen with an open mind to each other’s arguments.”

After the jury left the courtroom, Reddington reached over and rubbed Clancy’s back.

►CEMETERY

then launched a multiyear research project that led to the discovery of the buried women’s names and shed light on a mostly forgotten chapter of the city’s history.

“These women were building a city for us and with us at a time [when] they were not given credit or recognition for that at all,” Crockett said.

The women lived in a segregated elder home on Beacon Hill between 1860 and 1944. They were domestic servants and suffrage activists. They were congregants at Twelfth Baptist, then known as the Fugitive Slave Church. Some had been born into Southern slavery and moved north after the Civil War.

They were not welcome at the nearby Home for Aged Women, where the residents were white and mostly Protestant. The homes were only a few blocks apart. Their burial sites were even closer — literally adjacent plots at Cedar Grove. But only one had headstones. The residents of the Home for Aged Colored Women were buried, and then their names — or at least their burial sites — were largely forgotten.

In 2024, Rita Steele, a data analytics professional and avid genealogist, was trying to trace her family tree to its Native American roots. She thought her fourth great-grandmother, Sarah Smith, who died in Boston in 1890, might provide the link.

“So I used one of my successful research strategies (reverse address search) of the address on her death certificate,” Steele said by text message. She assumed the Beacon Hill address was a family home. But instead, “it came back with the name for the Home for Aged Colored Women.”

That discovery led her to a blog post by Linehan about the Dorchester burial site. She got in touch with Linehan and Crockett and has been involved in planning the memorial ever since.

Crockett’s research has proceeded on a parallel track. After learning of the burial site from Linehan, she assigned her MIT graduate students to research the home. The cemetery had handwritten note cards listing the women’s names in its archives. Then they found the home’s records in the archives of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

What emerged was an unusually intimate portrait of the women’s lives. The records

Neither of the cemetery’s markers lists the names of the 133 Black women buried there. On Tuesday night, Roxbury artist Ekua Holmes unveiled a temporary memorial, to remain for a year while money for a permanent memorial is raised.

showed “who was an avid reader, who was a vegetarian, who didn’t like who,” Linehan said. “There was gossipy stuff in there.”

For Crockett, the research also challenged the assumption that Black Bostonians, especially elderly Black women, must have been isolated, only marginal participants in the life of the city. Eliza Gardner, who received financial assistance from the home, was a prominent public speaker and member of Black political organizations, Crockett said. She was once featured in The Woman’s Era, a newspaper founded in Boston in 1894.

Other women were part of migrations to New England. Some came from Canada, others from the American South.

Annie B. Merrick was born into slavery in North Carolina in 1848, according to Crockett. She moved north and then lived in the Home for Aged Colored Women beginning in 1923. She died at Boston State Hospital in 1941.

Smith, Steele’s ancestor, was born in Newport, R.I., around 1799. Her father had been enslaved and fought in the Revolutionary War. Two of Smith’s brothers were abolitionists who worked with Frederick Douglass. Steele and Crockett are still trying to learn more about Smith herself.

Steele traveled from her home in Maryland to attend the ceremony. “There’s tons of work to be done,” she said. “I hope this is a flicker of light for someone.”

The women, including her ancestor, Smith, are buried in two plots — the one next to the white women’s burial ground and a second one that was used when the first filled up.

The temporary memorial is a “collage” of flowers and women’s portraits formed into a single figure to “reflect both the individuality of each woman and her presence in a greater community,” artist Ekua Holmes said.

The Roxbury-born artist entered the chapel to applause. She drew inspiration from Ellis Wilson’s “Funeral Procession” painting, she said.

The installation will remain there for a year while the non-profit Heritage Trail raises money for a permanent memorial that includes all of the women’s names.

Robert MacEachern, who runs the cemetery, estimates the memorial will cost more than $100,000. The past two state budgets earmarked $45,000 combined for the project. A grant from the city of Boston paid for Holmes’s work but is not funding the permanent memorial.

When Steele first learned of Smith’s burial place, she found the circumstances “very disturbing and disappointing.”

“No one knew who they were walking by,” she said. “Like they didn’t mean anything to anyone. . . . But I am so proud that their names are finally being restored.”

In Clancy trial, identity of jurors is likely to remain secret

‘The justice system owes them the highest degree of vigilance for their personal safety.’

SUPERIOR COURT JUDGE BEVERLY CANNONE, discussing juror safety during the Karen Read trial.

By John R. Ellement and Jeremiah Manion

Who are they?

The nine women and three men deliberating the fate of Lindsay Clancy have spent more than a month in one of the most public trials in recent Massachusetts history, but their names are known to just a select few people — the judge, the defense, the prosecution, and court staff.

And that secrecy may continue once they complete their service. The Supreme Judicial Court, while acknowledging that the disclosure of the names of jurors is a bedrock of Massachusetts law dating back to the 1770s, also authorizes judges to impound their identifying information for periods of time.

Such a determination could be made for a range of reasons, but most notably to prevent jurors from being harassed and also for their physical safety.

Following the Karen Read case, another recent high-profile murder trial, Superior Court Judge Beverly Cannone invoked a 2007 SJC ruling that concluded “the justice system owes them the highest degree of vigilance for their personal safety.”

“The Court concludes that there is a risk of immediate and irreparable injury should the list be made available to the public at this time,” Cannone wrote.

The issue took on new significance in the Clancy case Wednesday after a Sutton woman was accused of using her cell-phone to video jurors as they left the courthouse Tuesday.

“The sanctity of the judicial system is at risk because of her actions,” Assistant District Attorney Nicole Piacentini said in court Wednesday.

But the defense attorney for 56-year-old Dawn I. Light said it was a “complete misunderstanding” and that Light, a retired registered nurse, was only trying to catch a glimpse of Clancy.

Light pleaded not guilty to an intimidation of witness charge and was released on personal recognizance.

Defense attorney Kevin J. Reddington, speaking to reporters outside the courthouse Wednesday, said he was not concerned about the woman’s actions. Judge William F. Sullivan questioned jurors in private and individually Wednesday and then allowed them to continue to deliberate.

While judges may impound the list of jurors for an indeterminate amount of time, there is no law or court decision that bars a juror, once the verdict has been returned, from sharing their thoughts publicly on social media or with the media if they choose to do so on their own.

“This Order shall not preclude any juror from identifying himself or herself and/or from speaking to the public about his or her jury service,” Cannone wrote in the Read case.

The concern about juror safety in the Clancy trial and efforts to protect their identities actually began when jury selection got underway. Sullivan identified prospective jurors by the panel number they were assigned when they came to court, instead of saying their names in Christine Kannler remembers distinctly when she knew her baby brother Peter was going to become a firefighter.

They were just kids growing up in Wakefield, and at the July 4th parade every year, Pete Kannler would gravitate toward the firefighters who marched by in their dress uniforms.

“We knew,” Christine Kannler said. “We all just knew.”

By the time he was in high school, Pete Kannler was a volunteer firefighter, training to be a paramedic. He knew what he wanted to do: to save lives.

He worked as a firefighter in Westwood for a couple of years, and loved it, but craving bigger challenges, he moved to the Chelsea Fire Department.

He didn’t confine his ambition to Chelsea. When Katrina devastated New Orleans, he headed south with other first responders to help people there.

He also became an instructor at the Massachusetts Fire-fighting Academy in Stow, teaching new recruits state-of-the-art tactics meant to save civilian lives and minimize the risk to firefighters. He took recruits through the academy’s burn building with the zeal of a Marine drill instructor, imparting skills that saved all kinds of lives.

“He just wanted to help people,” his sister recalled. “It was in his DNA.”

Unfortunately, as he knocked down fires, something more sinister invaded his DNA. In 2015, he went for a checkup and learned he had Stage 4 esophageal cancer. He was 37, looked and felt healthy, and had a condition that usually strikes people in their 60s. He died a little over a year later.

Boston-area Senate race undecided

Wu-backed candidates defeated in two others

By Niki Griswold
GLOBE STAFF

One day after Massachusetts’ primary election, a Boston-area state Senate race is still too close to call, with just a handful of votes separating a Democratic incumbent from a Mayor Michelle Wu-backed challenger.

The still undecided contest between first-time candidate Daniel Lander, a former Wu aide, and state Senator William N. Brownsberger appears likely to go to a recount. Since polls closed Tuesday night, vote tallies have seesawed back and forth.

The final result will offer a measure of Wu’s political influence beyond Boston City Hall, after two other state Senate candidates she endorsed lost Tuesday.

Wu downplayed the outcome of the primary in an interview Wednesday, noting that she backed two first-time candidates who took on entrenched incumbents.

“Every election matters, and every year matters for getting things done, and that’s what we saw in the results from yesterday,” Wu said. “We had first-time candidates who started with no name recognition, taking on incumbents, and really outperforming expectations.”

In addition to Lander, Wu backed education activist Latoya Gayle, also a first-time candidate, in her unsuccessful bid to unseat state Senator Nick Collins of South Boston.

Wu has publicly clashed with both Collins and Brownsberger in recent years, and her endorsement of their challengers raised eyebrows as an attempt to oust her political adversaries on Beacon Hill.

Wu also endorsed state Senator Michael F. Rush of West Roxbury, an eight-term incumbent who lost to attorney Persis Yu in a district that includes Dedham, Norwood, Walpole, Westwood, and parts of Jamaica Plain, Roslindale, West Roxbury, and Hyde Park.

On Tuesday, Gayle lost to Collins by roughly 10 percentage points. And Yu unseated Rush by winning 51 percent of the vote to Rush’s 49 percent.

Lander and Brownsberger, though, remain neck and neck. As of 6:30 p.m. Wednesday, Lander had 12,132 votes — a mere three votes ahead of Brownsberger, who tallied 12,129 according to the Associated Press.

The candidates have until 3 p.m. Thursday to request a districtwide recount, in a race where more is riding on the outcome than just who will represent a district that covers swaths of Boston, Cambridge, Watertown, and Belmont, in the state Senate. Nei-

Perkins is Democrats’ choice for Norfolk DA

By Laura Crimaldi and John R. Ellement

Former state prosecutor Djuna Perkins on Wednesday declared victory in the seven-way Democratic primary in the Norfolk district attorney’s race, making her the clear frontrunner to succeed the outgoing incumbent.

In an interview with the Globe, Perkins, 58, a Dedham resident, said her experience, integrity, and vows to reform the DA’s office resonated with voters. Being first to declare her candidacy — more than a year before Norfolk District Attorney Michael W. Morrissey announced that he would not run again —demonstrated she’s “not afraid of anybody” and gave her time to build relationships with voters, Perkins said.

“It showed that I was willing to challenge an incumbent,” said Perkins.

She formed a campaign committee in September 2024. Morrissey announced in January that he wouldn’t see reelection.

In recent years, Morrissey has faced criticism over his office’s handling of two high-profile cases — the prosecution of Karen Read in the death of her boyfriend, Boston police officer John O’Keefe, and the 2021 death of Sandra Birchmore, a young pregnant woman and former participant in a Stoughton police youth program.

Perkins declared victory shortly after 8:30 a.m. Wednesday in an email to supporters. She wrote that her campaign seeks to restore integrity to Norfolk County’s criminal justice system so that it’s not influenced by money or power and keeps residents safe.

With 97 percent of precincts reporting results, Perkins led the field with 28,067 votes, according to the Associated Press call.

The tally gave her 29 percent of the vote. Perkins was the top vote-getter in 15 of 28 Norfolk County communities. She dominated the western portion of the district, winning towns from Bellingham on the Rhode Island border north to the Boston suburb of Brookline.

“This is exactly what a grass-roots campaign is,” Perkins told the Globe.

Her closest competitor was Adam Deitch, a former federal prosecutor.

Deitch, 43, relocated last year from East Boston to Quincy to run, citing his experience investigating public corruption in Norfolk County.

He finished with 25,473 votes, just under 2,600 behind Perkins, and carried Quin-

UMass poll: 75% say there is a ‘great deal’ of federal corruption

Blame diverges along party lines

By Nick Stoico

GLOBE STAFF

Nearly all Americans believe corruption exists in the federal government, but Democrats and Republicans are sharply divided over where it lies and judge similar presidential behavior differently depending on which party is in power, according to a new poll from the University of Massachusetts Amherst.

The national survey found 97 percent of respondents believe there is at least some corruption in the federal government, while 75 percent said there is a “great deal.”

Those views cross party lines, according to the poll, with 81 percent of Democrats, 72 percent of independents, and 69 percent of Republicans saying corruption is significant.

“At a time of intense polarization, when Americans are deeply divided along partisan, ideological, generational, class and racial lines, they speak with one voice on this question, overwhelmingly agreeing that corruption exists in Washington,” Tatishe Nteta, a UMass Amherst political science professor and director of the poll, said in a statement.

But Americans diverge sharply over which parts of the government they believe are most corrupt, according to the poll, which surveyed 1,000 adults nationwide Aug. 21-26.

About 53 percent of respondents identified the presidency as the government’s most corrupt institution. About 87 percent of Democrats ranked it first, compared with just 18 percent of Republicans. Republicans were more likely to point to the federal bureaucracy (44 percent) and Congress (30 percent) as corrupt.

The poll found more agreement about what kinds of conduct are corrupt. Broad majorities considered trading political access or votes for campaign donations, using public office for personal or family financial gain, using federal agencies to probe political opponents, and changing election rules for partisan advantage to be corrupt.

More than 80 percent of respondents said an elected representative who trades votes for campaign contributions should face either a criminal or ethics investigation.

“This isn’t partisan, either, as 87 percent of Democrats and 87 percent of Republicans want an investigation if a politician does this,” Raymond La Raja, a UMass Amherst political science professor and co-director of the poll, said in a statement.

An experiment included in the survey found that partisan loyalties can dramatically affect how Americans evaluate the same behavior. Respondents were given a scenario in which a president directed federal agencies to investigate politicians from the opposing party, and researchers randomly changed which party the president was associated with.

Among Republicans, 64 percent called the conduct very or extremely corrupt when a Democratic president targeted Republican opponents. When a Republican president was described doing the same thing, that number dropped to 22 percent, according to the poll.

Democrats also showed a partisan double standard, but it was smaller. When the scenario involved a Democratic president, about 48 percent of Democrats viewed the conduct as very or extremely corrupt. When it involved a Republican president, that number jumped to 78 percent, according to the data.

“We did not use the name Trump in our question, but it is likely that some Republicans were thinking about defending his actions in their responses,” La Raja said. “Democrats show a double standard too, although a smaller one. We have a bipartisan view that this type of behavior is corrupt, but we apply it differently depending on whether the president is ‘on our team.’”

The survey found widespread distrust of President Trump on questions involving his business interests. Two out of three respondents said they do not trust Trump to avoid using the presidency to benefit his family’s businesses, and 61 percent lacked confidence in his ability to make decisions that serve the public interest. And 77 percent said he should not profit from business ventures while serving as president, according to the poll.

Respondents also largely opposed putting Trump’s name or image on federal buildings. Sixty-one percent opposed hanging Trump banners on federal buildings, 62 percent opposed adding his name to the Kennedy Center, and 56 percent opposed renaming a Navy battleship class after him, according to the survey.

The poll also found broad dissatisfaction with the country’s direction and economy, with 69 percent saying the country is on the wrong track, an increase of 15 percentage points from a UMass poll in April 2025.

Views of the economy were also bleak. Large majorities said groceries, gas, and utilities had increased in recent months, and 53 percent blamed Trump for the climb.

Fourteen-year-old Stone Fornes has reeled in all kinds of fish off Nantucket, from mako and sandbar sharks to a white marlin so massive that he shattered the junior world record two summers ago.

But one recent catch took him by surprise.

While casting for sharks on the island’s south shore Friday, Fornes saw the tip of his rod bounce and started feeding the line. But something struck him as odd. If he had a shark on the line, it was sure putting up a funny fight. He could feel the fish chomping on the bait, swimming slowly and its tail thumping hard.

After about 10 minutes, he wrestled it out of the surf, immediately recognizing the tropical species.

“Oh my gosh, that’s a cubera snapper,” he recalled thinking. “I’ve wanted to catch one of these since I was 6.”

It’s believed to be the first time the carnivorous reef fish has been caught off Nantucket, according to available data.

The sight of a catch he’d long dreamed of left Fornes awestruck. He estimated the large, almond-shaped fish, also known as a Cuban snapper, weighed roughly 40 pounds. Its dark brown body had a deep reddish tinge, and its long canine teeth — suited for feeding on crustaceans like lobsters and crabs — protruded from its mouth.

Fornes knew it was very unusual for the fish to be this far north. The largest snapper in the Atlantic, the species is rarely found in waters north of Florida and is often seen around ledges over rocky bottoms.

“I recently moved to Florida, so I’ve been thinking, ‘How am I going to get one?’” said Fornes, who is homeschooled and lives on Nantucket most of the year. “What are the chances that I catch it on my home turf ... where they never come?”

After taking photos and videos of his prized catch, the teen worked fast to release it back into the water.

“I have so much respect for this animal,” Fornes said. “I was pretty excited that it swam off strong.”

He was still shaking with excitement the next morning, sharing the news with friends. He hopes his documentation, including GoPro footage and pictures of the snapper, will be useful for scientists.

This is “primetime” for uncommon marine life sightings in Massachusetts, said Mike O’Neill, associate curator of aquatic collections at the New England Aquarium. As ocean temperatures heat up during the summer months, the water becomes warm enough for creatures that typically live farther south to migrate into the region, he said.

Such species seldom travel beyond Cape Cod, where there are warmer pockets of water, O’Neill added.

Observations recorded on iNaturalist, a citizen science network, indicate that cubera snappers have only been spotted twice in northern waters in the past five years — once near Long Island, N.Y., and another time near Nova Scotia, he said.

“This fish likely was a little bit more adventurous than your typical cubera snapper,” he said.

It’s too soon to say whether the species might start to appear more frequently around here because of how rare they are now, O’Neill said. Still, he added, “there’s so much evidence of range expansion.”

Cyclist killed by pickup truck driver in Lynn identified

On Wednesday, officials identified the man who was fatally struck by a pickup truck while riding his bicycle in downtown Lynn this week.

Emerson Imul-Molina, 30, was rushed to Salem Hospital Monday after a truck ran into his bicycle at the intersection of Broad and Silsbee streets, the Essex district attorney’s office said Wednesday.

The collision occurred around 9:30 p.m.

The driver of the truck, a 2025 Honda Ridgeline, has not been charged, officials said. Local and state police are investigating the crash.

Imul-Molina’s death is the second bicycle fatality in the North Shore city this summer. In Investigators determined that Naveed had been paddle-

Wounding of officer yields 16-year sentence

Convicted for 2025 shooting

By Lauren Albano
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

A Hyde Park man will serve at least 16 years in state prison for a 2025 shooting that wounded a Boston police officer, officials said Tuesday.

Daiquan Rice, 32, was convicted by a jury last week of assault and battery with a firearm, carrying a firearm without a license, and carrying a loaded firearm without a license, Suffolk District Attorney Kevin Hayden's office said in a statement.

Judge Mark Hallal Tuesday sentenced Rice to 12 to 13 years in state prison for the assault and battery and four to five years for firearm possession, to be served consecutively, the statement said.

Hallal also sentenced Rice to two years of probation for carrying a loaded firearm without a license with conditions that he obtain a GED or equivalent degree and complete a violence prevention program, the statement said.

"This is an appropriate sentence for such a reckless and dangerous action," Hayden said. "I'm so grateful that the officer survived and was able to overcome his injuries. We will never relent in prosecuting anyone who harms or attempts to harm our law enforcement officers."

Rice was convicted of several prior firearm-related offenses out of Suffolk Superior Court, where he received a seven-to-10-year prison sentence with three years of probation to follow, the statement said.

Rice was on probation and parole at the time of the shooting.

On Sept. 12, 2025, at about 12:45 a.m., officers were patrolling the area of Washington and Dudley streets to address complaints about quality-of-life issues in Nubian Square, including complaints of people congregating in and around the African American Veterans Memorial Park, the statement said.

Officers reported several people in the park and one person standing away from the group smoking, the statement said. The park has posted signs indicating it closes at dusk and prohibits smoking.

Officers approached the person smoking, later identified as Rice, and he began walking in the opposite direction. Rice fled down Washington Street when officers exited their cruiser, the statement said.

Officers followed as Rice turned right toward Kenilworth Street. Rice shot an officer in the arm during the pursuit, which prompted police to return fire, the statement said.

Rice and the officer were taken to hospitals with wounds that were not considered life-threatening, Boston Police Commissioner Michael Cox told reporters near the scene later that day.

Police recovered a loaded firearm with a large-capacity magazine, the statement said.

Three additional officers were treated for non-life-threatening injuries at local hospitals, according to past Globe coverage.

"This is another example of the amount of guns that are out there," Cox said. "We're very lucky and fortunate that there was no loss of life here."

Sullivan also barred news media from photographing or broadcasting the faces of the Clancy jurors; that, however, is standard in every trial in the state since cameras were allowed into Massachusetts courtrooms in 1980.

The SJC has codified the no-photo policy into Rule 1:19, the general photo rule, which spells out three explicit areas that are off-limits to photographs at trials at all levels of the criminal justice system. The rule uses the phrase "a judge shall not permit," which is the legal equivalent of a hard stop.

Under the rule, judges are not allowed to:

R.I. survey shows high cost of health care

By Carlos Muñoz and Dan McGowan
GLOBE STAFF

Nearly one in three Rhode Islanders said they or someone in their household put off seeking medical treatment because they were concerned about the cost of care, according to a survey released Tuesday by the University of Rhode Island.

The Rhode Island Survey Initiative found that 29 percent of Rhode Islanders or people in their households delayed medical treatment within the last year, an alarming number that tracks similarly to some of the national averages.

It's a useful reminder of a health care problem that can get lost amid the campaign-trail debates: While the vast majority of Rhode Islanders have health insurance, they still might not be able to afford the care they need.

"The data show us that unaffordable health care costs serve as barriers to care," said Julie Keller, URI associate professor of sociology and the lead researcher for the Rhode Island Survey Initiative. "This is especially concerning since delaying care often leads to poor health outcomes."

Among those who said they delayed recommended care, 47 percent said they couldn't afford it, while another 23 percent said they could afford it but didn't think it was worth the cost.

The survey was conducted online by YouGov from July 29 to Aug. 13 and included 500 Rhode Island adults. The margin of error is plus or minus 5.73 percentage points.

The survey also shows that Rhode Islanders trust their health care providers for reliable information on health issues over political leaders or state or federal agencies. The survey found 93 percent trusted health care providers a great deal or fair amount. Trust dropped to 56 percent for Rhode Island government officials, 66 percent for the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 42 percent for Health Secretary Robert Kennedy Jr., and 35 percent for President Trump.

The annual survey also found overall trust in state government had increased slightly year over year, with 59 percent trusting state government a great deal or a fair amount in 2026, compared to 57 percent in 2025, while trust in the federal government decreased slightly to 39 percent in 2026, compared to 41 percent in 2025.

Saving lives in her brother's memory

Pete Kannler's death had a profound impact on many people, especially his older sister, a doctor. Christine Kannler went to Boston University for her undergraduate degree and stayed on for medical school.

She also earned a degree in public health, and it was that focus, combined with her brother's death at such a young age, that led her on a medical odyssey.

After Pete died, she did considerable research and wondered why firefighters weren't being routinely screened for cancer from an early age, given how many carcinogens they are exposed to on the job.

She found firefighters had a 9 percent greater chance to develop cancer than the general population, and a 14 percent higher chance of dying from it.

"Medicine should be thinking about individuals in terms of their occupational exposure," she said. "It isn't just cancer. Firefighters also have an increased risk for cardiac events."

Trained as a dermatologist, she started by offering skin cancer screening to Pete's former colleagues, firefighters in Westwood and Chelsea. She did this on her own time, on her own dime.

In 2018, when she reached out to then-state Fire Marshal Peter Ostroskey at the fire academy, and the Professional Fire Fighters of Massachusetts and Local 718, the unions which represent firefighters statewide and in the Boston Fire Department, respectively, they were enthusiastic about taking the program statewide.

Other dermatologists volunteered their services.

Under Ostroskey, the program expanded to include chest CT scans and PSA blood tests. When Jon Davine succeeded him as fire marshal, mammograms and ultrasounds were added in 2023.

To make it as easy and accessible as possible, the testing is done at firehouses, union meetings, and other gatherings of firefighters. That testing, all of it free of charge to firefighters and their departments, has detected cancers early and saved lives.

One firefighter in Wakefield, who grew up with the Kannlers, was tested and was discovered to have breast cancer. But because it was caught early, her chances of recovery dramatically improved.

There is a firefighter in Chicopee, a captain, who, two years ago, got an ultrasound that detected kidney cancer before he developed any symptoms. He had a successful surgery and is back on the job.

Christine Kannler said her brother lives on in the memory of so many, not just his family and closest friends.

"I'm always amazed at how many people remember my brother," she said. "He was such a great teacher, and he got up every day, determined to help people."

"What happened to Pete was very tragic, very unfortunate. But if we can save one person's life, if we've taught one doctor to listen more closely to firefighters, then we've made a world of difference."

She continues to lobby medical associations, legislators, and anybody who will listen. Like her baby brother, she's relentless.

On Thursday, the 10th anniversary of Pete Kannler's death, Christine Kannler and those who knew and loved him will gather to unveil his portrait on the walls of the fire academy in Stow.

Ten years after he died, he lives on in all his brothers and sisters on the job, who are alive because his life inspired his sister to save others.

There is a brass plaque under Pete Kannler's portrait. It reads: His Legacy Endures.

From the left, she seeks to overtake rivals in bid for Congress

N.H. candidate credits organizing for momentum

By Steven Porter
GLOBE STAFF

HAMPTON FALLS, N.H. — Democratic congressional candidate Carleigh Beriont told dozens of supporters at a house party last week that she launched her progressive campaign well over a year ago to offer voters an alternative.

Beriont said she respects both Stefany Shaheen and Maura Sullivan, the center-left candidates widely viewed as the top two Democratic contenders for New Hampshire’s competitive First Congressional District. But she also views them as “two sides of the exact same coin.”

Now, as Shaheen and Sullivan lock horns in an increasingly acrimonious race to succeed Democratic US Representative Chris Pappas, who is running for US Senate, Beriont seems to be gaining momentum in the crucial final days ahead of the Sept. 8 primary — a turn of events that she and others attribute to grass-roots organizing.

“The pieces are coming together at the right time,” she said, “and hopefully we’ll just grow from here.”

Beriont, 37, a lecturer at the Harvard Kennedy School of Government, previously helped to organize a graduate student labor union and now serves in local government as chair of the Hampton Select Board. She said some 1,200 volunteers have been working with her campaign, including leaders in 60 of the district’s 75 municipalities.

While she supports a bevy of decidedly progressive positions — such as enacting “Medicare for All,” abolishing US Immigration and Customs Enforcement, and calling for restrictions on US military aid in response to what she describes as Israel’s “genocidal” and “apartheid” policies toward Palestinians — she said her core message resonates across the political spectrum.

“The primary divide in this country right now ... is not between Democrats and Republicans,” she said. “It is not between progressives and moderates, despite how much money is being spent to convince us that. The primary divide right now is between regular people, who are just trying to survive and live their lives, and a political and an economic system that treats us like we don’t matter.”

Beriont criticized President Trump by name and acknowledged that this midterm election will decide which party holds congressional power for the second half of his term. But she didn’t place Trump at the center of her messaging.

“This is not about him,” she told supporters. “It is about us.”

There had been signs that another candidate might consolidate support among progressives and emerge as the clear third option in this race. But public opinion surveys show Be-

BARRY CHIN/GLOBE STAFF

Carleigh Beriont has been building a grass-roots network of support and has gained ground in recent polling. Fellow progressive Christian Urrutia (right) carried a weighted military rucksack on an 18-mile march from Manchester to Concord to call attention to the problem of suicides among veterans.

FINN GOMEZ FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

rioriont is the only one to make big gains in recent months.

Heath Howard, 26, a state lawmaker endorsed by the local Democratic Socialists of America, had made an early splash in the polls after heckling retiring Senator Jeanne Shaheen — who is Stefany Shaheen’s mother — during a Democratic fund-raiser last fall. But he struggled to keep his campaign finances in the black and encountered push-back for telling a transgender colleague she would be unable to win a congressional race.

Howard, who slipped in the polls, suspended his campaign on Aug. 24 and endorsed Beriont.

“I call on all candidates without establishment backing to do the same,” he said in a statement, “so we can finish the job and avoid vote-splitting.”

Christian Urrutia, 42, whose work experience includes time as a Pentagon attorney and then an Airbnb executive, is still in the running. He has raised more campaign cash than any of the other progressives, enabling him to run TV ads alongside Shaheen and Sullivan.

Urrutia garnered attention in June by donning a 35-pound backpack and walking 18 miles from Manchester to Concord to raise awareness about the 18 military veterans who die by suicide each day. He also locked in the endorsement of Our Revolution, a progressive group aligned with US Senator Bernie Sanders.

Urrutia emphasized his support for a universal health care system, trumpeting Medicare for All during an Aug. 18 press conference in Manchester, where he displayed a poster board that contrasted his views with those of Shaheen and Sullivan — a visual aid that sought to portray himself, not Beriont, as the progressive alternative in this race.

Sullivan has campaigned on the more moderate idea of establishing a public option for health insurance, using the slogan “Medicare for All Who Want It.” Shaheen has likewise touted a public option while also expressing support for a range of ideas, including Medicare for All.

Urrutia said polling shows voters are still looking for someone else to support, despite Shaheen and Sullivan having spent millions on their campaigns.

The Saint Anselm College Survey Center released a poll on Aug. 20 that showed likely Democratic primary voters in the First Congressional District were divided into four roughly equal segments: While 26 percent supported Sullivan and 24 percent supported Shaheen, a combined 22 percent backed one of several progressives, and another 27 percent remained undecided win. Getting to 35 percent might be enough, he said. No candidate has reached that threshold in polls.

The latest UNH survey data showed Sullivan and Shaheen statistically tied, at 24 percent and 19 percent, respectively. Sullivan had been at 8 percent in January, when Shaheen was at 33 percent in the UNH data.

Smith said Beriont seems to possess the type of charisma that has helped to propel progressives to recent victories in other states. Her campaign has focused thus far on grass-roots organizing and face-to-face networking, given its relatively limited financial resources, he said.

“That old-fashioned shoe-leather campaigning is something that candidates without money are stuck with,” he said. “But it’s effective when you can do it.”

Steve Marchand, a Democratic operative and former gubernatorial candidate who writes about New Hampshire politics on Substack, said in a recent post that part of what sets Beriont apart is her demeanor. Among all the candidates, she seems to be the least angry, he said.

“She is feisty,” he wrote, “but in a Happy Warrior sort of way.”

This swingy district, which encompasses much of New Hampshire’s eastern half, including Manchester and has historically flipped back and forth between the parties. In the current political climate, analysts generally see Democrats as better positioned than Republicans to win the seat.

The big question now is whether Democratic voters will pick one of the center-left candidates on Sept. 8 or perhaps prefer the top alternative.

Perkins is Democrats’ choice for Norfolk DA

cy, Norfolk County’s largest city. In a statement, Deitch said he called Perkins early Wednesday to concede and congratulate her.

“Our job does not end with this election — it continues,” he said. “We must keep fighting for a justice system defined by fairness, trust, and accountability and where, at its core, everyone is treated the same.”

The other candidates were Greg Connor, Morrissey’s former top homicide prosecutor; former Suffolk County prosecutors Macy Lee and Craig MacLellan; Robert Jubinville, a former Governor’s Councilor from Milton; and Braintree defense attorney Jim Barakat.

The primary contest was a search for the best candidate to chart a new course for the office following outcry over Morrissey’s work on the Read and Birchmore cases. Morrissey did not return messages Wednesday.

A jury last year acquitted Read of all charges connected to

“This is exactly what a grass-roots campaign is.”

DJUNA PERKINS, of her victory in the Democratic primary for Norfolk District Attorney

O’Keefe’s death.

In the Birchmore case, Morrissey’s office did not file any criminal charges, citing the state medical examiner’s finding that Birchmore killed herself.

Then in 2024, the FBI arrested former Stoughton police detective Matthew Farwell, 40, and charged him with killing Birchmore. He has pleaded not guilty.

Federal prosecutors allege Farwell, a married father, strangled Birchmore, 23, to prevent her from revealing that he sexually assaulted her when she was 15 and then secretly maintained sexual contact with her through her adulthood.

Perkins has said Birchmore’s case motivated her to run for office. She has highlighted her experience leading the domestic violence unit at the Suffolk district attorney’s office and her private legal practice representing survivors of sexual abuse and harassment.

“I’ve spent my entire career working with victims of sexual assault and domestic violence and other crimes as well,” she said. “I think that resonated with a lot of voters.”

If she prevails in the November election, Perkins said she would investigate why the Read and Birchmore matters proceeded as they did under Morrissey and publish the findings “to the extent possible.”

She said she would consider a grand jury investigation into the Stoughton Police Department youth program in which Birchmore met Farwell when she was a minor. The examination would look at whether any adults were aware of child sexual abuse within the program and either cooperated or failed to act, Perkins said.

Her other priorities are auditing closed and pending case files and reviewing prosecution protocols, policies, and training materials.

She said she would post prosecution statistics and police shooting reports on the DA office’s website.

Perkins also promised to scrutinize the staff, a process that would entail interviewing all the approximately 130 employees.

“When the community is demanding reform, which I think was a pretty clear mandate from this outcome, we have to be open to examining everything,” she said.

In her victory email, Perkins said she plans to return to the campaign trail “immediately.”

She now faces Joseph M. Pagliarulo, a former state prosecutor from Millis who is running as a self-funded independent with $3,000 he donated to his campaign.

There is no Republican candidate.

In a phone interview Wednesday, Pagliarulo, 60, said

DJUNA PERKINS CAMPAIGN

Djuna Perkins said that if she wins the November election, she would investigate why the Karen Read and Sandra Birchmore matters proceeded as they did under the last DA.

he will rely on his own financial resources to pay for his campaign and does not intend to accept contributions.

“I’m an independent in the true sense of the word,” said Pagliarulo, a former Suffolk County prosecutor.

He cited Birchmore’s case as motivating him to run, and promised, if elected, to bring the matter before a grand jury. Perkins said she wants to see what happens at Farwell’s federal trial before deciding.

Uyterhoeven declares victory in Middlesex state Senate race

By John Hilliard
GLOBE STAFF

State Representative Erika Uyterhoeven won the Democratic nomination for state Senate in a district including Somerville and surrounding communities, after her primary opponents conceded and the Associated Press called the race in her favor Wednesday.

Uyterhoeven, who identifies as a democratic socialist and faces no GOP opponent in November, seems all but certain to succeed Senator Patricia Jehlen to represent the 2nd Middlesex district, which also includes Medford, as well as parts of Winchester and Cambridge. Jehlen did not run for reelection.

The Associated Press called the election for Uyterhoeven late Wednesday morning. All precincts in the district had reported voting results for the race.

Uyterhoeven had already declared victory in the race Tuesday night. Poll results available Wednesday show Uyterhoeven secured 37 percent of the vote, with 12,335 votes cast for her, according to the AP. State Representative Christine P. Barber, who had the endorsement of Jehlen in the race, came in second, with 10,142 votes cast, or 30 percent of the vote Tuesday.

Barber conceded the race, according to Skyler Nash, a campaign spokesperson, Wednesday morning.

Barber was first elected to the House in 2014, following a victory in a four-way Democratic primary that year. Barber gave up her House seat to run for the state Senate.

When Barber announced her campaign in January, she said she was running for Senate “to build on” Jehlen’s legacy.

Jehlen had served in the state House of Representatives from 1991 to 2005 before winning a special election for her Senate seat.

Somerville City Councilor Matthew McLaughlin and Cambridge City Councilor Burhan Azeem, two other candidates in the race, also conceded.

Uyterhoeven, first elected as a Somerville state representative in 2020, is poised to represent one of the most progressive legislative districts in the state.

She made headlines for her strong criticism of federal deportation tactics aimed at immigrants, declaring that “We need to get ICE the [expletive] out of Massachusetts.”

A fifth Democrat on the primary ballot in the state Senate race, Thomas E. Hopcroft, the former head of the Mass Technology Leadership Council, dropped out of the race in late July.

her candidate responded Wednesday for comment.

Wu took a risk spending her political capital backing newcomers against established incumbents, said Erin O’Brien, a political science professor at the University of Massachusetts Boston.

“People are going to do the tally,” O’Brien said. “If you endorse and the person loses, it goes against your tally.”

Still, O’Brien argued it would be premature to assume the losses are a reflection that the mayor’s influence or popularity are waning.

“Wu’s a variable,” O’Brien said. “She’s not a determining force.”

But on a night where most incumbents across the state retained their seats, Rush’s loss, especially with Wu’s endorsement, was a notable outlier.

The result reflected the broader trend across the country as Democratic voters showed an increasing appetite for generational change and progressive leadership, according to David Hopkins, a political science professor at Boston College. Yu, who defeated Rush, ran to his left.

“There is clearly this increasingly mobilized progressive vote in Democratic primaries here in this state, as well many other places around the country,” Hopkins said.

“Some Democratic incumbents are facing serious competition, sometimes for the first time in many years, or the first time in their career.”

On Wednesday, Rush’s campaign did not respond to a request comment.

Wu defended her endorsement of the West Roxbury Democrat, who faced a progressive challenger who espoused many of the same talking points as Lander and Gayle.

Still, Rush “has often been the first to call and ask what Boston needs in the state Senate,” Wu said.

“He has moved issues and funding for us quietly and effectively, and I wish he would still be in a position to help serve our community, [but] the voters have spoken.”

In an interview in the wake of her loss against Collins, Gayle said that the 10-point margin in her race shows that Boston voters are scrutinizing incumbents’ records and demanding urgency from elected leadership.

“The people are watching,” Gayle said.

“It’s important that when you show up to the state House, when you volunteer for this job, that you are listening to the people and pushing the policies, the budget, the things that the people actually need and want.”

Said Unit is conveyed subject to:

1. The provisions of the Declaration of Easements.
2. Easements in favor of adjoining units and in favor of the Common Elements.
3. The provisions of the continuance of all encroachments of such adjoining units or Common Elements on the Unit, now existing as a result of construction of the Building, which may come into existence hereafter as a result of alteration or shifting of the Building or as a result of repair or restoration of the Building or of any adjoining unit or of the Common Elements after damage or destruction by fire or other casualty or after taking in condemnation or eminent domain proceedings, or by reason of an alteration or repair to the Common Elements made by or with the consent of the Board of Managers.

4. An easement in favor of the other units to use the pipes, wires, ducts, flues conduits, cables, public utility lines and other Common Elements located in the Unit or elsewhere on the Property and serving such other units.
4. Exclusive rights in favor of the owners of other units to use the patio areas described in their respective Unit Deeds.
5. The provisions of and matters referred to in the Master Deeds, By-Laws and floor plans of the condominium recorded simultaneously with and as part of the Master Deed, as the same may be amended from time to time to time by instrument recorded with said Registry, which provisions and matters, together with any amendments thereto, shall constitute covenants running with the land and shall bind the Unit and its heirs, assigns and successors, and all persons in the Unit, his family, servants and visitors, as through such provisions were recited and stipulated at length herein.

The Unit is conveyed subject also to a right of first refusal hereby reserved unto Colebrook to purchase the Unit in accordance with the terms and provisions hereof. If, prior to the initial sale by Colebrook of the Unit, the owner of the Unit or the Grantee shall desire to resell the Unit together with its appurtenant rights, easements and undivided proportionate interests in the Common Elements (collectively the “Appurtenant Interests”) and shall have received a bona fide offer to purchase the same Grantee shall give to Colebrook written notice thereof together with a copy of such bona fide offer by certified or registered mail addressed to Colebrook at 1500 Main Street, Springfield, Massachusetts 01115. Colebrook shall have the right to purchase the Unit and its Appurtenant Interests upon the same terms and conditions as set forth in such bona fide offer, provided that such bona fide offer (by certified or registered mail addressed to Grantee at the Unit) of Colebrook’s election to so purchase is given to Grantee, together with any deed or instrument for said bona fide offer, within fifteen (15) days immediately following the receipt by Colebrook of Grantee’s notice and copy of the bona fide offer. Any attempted sale of the Unit without affording Colebrook the right of first refusal as herein provided shall be null and void and shall confer no title or interest whatsoever to the offeror. The right of first refusal reserved herein shall not be applicable to the spouse or child of Grantee or devise by Grantee of the Unit together with its Appurtenant Interests to the spouse or any children of Grantee or to the acquisition or sale of a Unit together with its Appurtenant Interests to the spouse or any children of Grantee or to the acquire title thereto by foreclosure or by deed in lieu of foreclosure. However, the right of first refusal reserved herein shall apply to any purchaser of the Unit together with its Appurtenant Interests from such mortgagee and to any party acquiring the same through a sale, conveyance, gift or devise as aforesaid.

A certificate, recordable form Executed by Colebrook stating that the foregoing right of first refusal has terminated, expired, has been waived or is not applicable with respect to a proposed, sale conveyance or transfer of the Unit together with its Appurtenant Interests shall be conclusive upon Colebrook in favor of all persons who rely thereon in good faith. The unit intended only for residential purposes. No use may be made of the unit except as a residence for the Owner thereof or his permitted lessees and the members of their immediately families, no residential use may be made thereof by more than one family or by more than three (3) persons who are not related by blood or marriage, and no portion or all thereof may be used as a professional office, whether or not accessory to a residential use.

The premises will be sold subject to any and all unpaid taxes and other municipal assessments and liens, and subject to prior liens or other enforceable encumbrances of record entitled to precedence over this mortgage, and subject to and with the benefit of all easements, restrictions, reservations and conditions of record and subject to all tenancies and/or rights of parties in possession.

Terms of the Sale: Cashier’s or certified check in the sum of $5,000.00 as a deposit must be shown at the time and place of the sale in order to qualify as a bidder (the mortgage holder and its designee(s) are exempt from this requirement); high bidder to sign written Memorandum of Sale upon acceptance of bid; balance of purchase price payable by certified check in thirty (30) days from the date of the sale at the offices of mortgagee’s attorney, Korde & Associates, P.C., 900 Chelmsford Street, Suite 3102, Lowell, MA or such other time as may be designated by mortgagee. Megan Hilty let her memories of Dolly Parton flow during concert

By Don Aucoin
GLOBE STAFF

CONCORD — The Dolly Parton stories just keep on coming, and the legend just keeps on growing.

On Sunday night, performing in concert at the Umbrella Arts Center, singer-actress Megan Hilty got choked up as she delivered a tribute to Parton, who played a significant role in her career.

Parton had died less than a week earlier, and Hilty confessed to the audience that she wasn't sure she'd be able to talk about her. But she proved able to do so, mixing tender remembrance with humor.

Hilty got to know Parton while starring in the 2009 Broadway musical adaptation of "9 to 5," in which she played Doralee Rhodes, the take-no-guff secretary portrayed by Parton in the 1980 movie.

JIM SABITUS

Megan Hilty performed Sunday at the Umbrella Arts Center in Concord.

According to Hilty, when they first met, the famously buxom Parton pointed to Hilty's bust and joked: "We're going to have to do something about this." As workshops proceeded for the stage musical, whose score was composed by Parton, she was a constant source of warmth and encouragement for the younger performer.

Hilty recounted how Parton approached her one day with some new lyrics she'd scribbled for a song she wanted to incorporate into "9 to 5." Parton said to Hilty: "I'm going to sing it to you, and then I want you to sing it back to me."

(Parton did not live to see the Broadway premiere of her new autobiographical musical, "Dolly: A True Original Musical," which is slated to begin performances in December at the St. James Theatre.)

On Sunday night, Hilty chose to sing "Backwoods Barbie," which Parton recorded in 2008, the year before "9 to 5" opened on Broadway, and became part of the show's score. The song was inspired by Parton's life story and her experience of being underestimated, and Hilty performed it with deep feeling at the Umbrella Arts Center. Lyrics like "I might look artificial but where it counts I'm real" and "Even backwoods Barbies get their feelings hurt" landed with emotional impact.

Hilty — who starred in NBC's "Smash" (2012-13), and earlier this year wrapped up a lengthy run on Broadway in "Death Becomes Her" — achieved her career breakthrough when she was cast, right out of college, as a standby in the role of Glinda in the Broadway production of "Wicked." Seated in the audience at the Umbrella Arts Center a few rows from the stage was none other than Gregory Maguire, author of "Wicked: The Life and Times of the Wicked Witch of the West," the 1995 novel that started it all.

Hilty saluted Maguire, and also gave a shout-out to all the actresses who played Elphaba — 17, by her count — opposite her on Broadway and during a national tour. In tribute to them, she sang "For Good," from "Wicked."

It was a nearly prayerful and shiver-inducing performance that stopped the show, triggering a standing ovation from the Concord crowd. Odds are that when Hilty sang the words "Because I knew you/ I have been changed for good," she wasn't thinking only about her "Wicked" costars.

Patricia Cornwell opens up about revisiting past traumas in memoir 'True Crime'

KAYANA SZYMCAK FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

Patricia Cornwell in her Boston writing office in 2013.

By Lauren Daley
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

While Boston novelist Patricia Cornwell has delivered gripping stories to her readers for decades, she's never told her own story — until now.

In her New York Times best-selling memoir, "True Crime," Cornwell turns inward, offering readers an intimate look at everything from her difficult childhood, to struggles in her later years, as she made her climb to the top of bestsellers lists. As she recounts in the book, Cornwell grew up in Florida, where she was almost kidnapped by a child molester-turned-neighborhood patrolman as a kid. Both her parents also suffered from psychotic breaks. Later in life, she struggled with anorexia, almost died in a car crash, and was once harassed by Larry King on an airplane.

Yet Cornwell's story has a happy ending: She found true love in Boston and became a New York Times bestseller, with her fan-favorite Kay Scarpetta novels earning a small-screen adaptation on Prime Video, starring Nicole Kidman, Jamie Lee Curtis, and Bobby Cannavale. Cornwell's 30th Scarpetta novel, "Rapid and Fatal," releases in January.

Cornwell spoke to the Globe about her memoir and some of the painful chapters it covers.

Q. You started working on "True Crime" because somebody pitched a TV series about your life. Was this book cathartic to write?

A. I thought I'd write some notes to help the writers' room. Next thing I knew, this was erupting out of me. I'm not sure I'd call it cathartic. I'd go home every day exhausted and unsettled. But I've never written anything as fast as this memoir came out of me. It was like I had my finger in a wall-socket.

Q. You open with a powerful scene: your mom's psychotic break in North Carolina in 1966 as she burns her children's clothes.

A. I knew I had to start there because when she had that breakdown and took us to Billy Graham's house, that changed my life forever. It led to my friendship with [his wife] Ruth Graham. Ruth let me write her biography, which launched me as a writer. I don't know what would've happened to me if Ruth hadn't encouraged me.

Q. Your mom eventually took you and your brothers to the Graham house, begging Ruth to take you. Ruth got your mom help, but she was taken to a crude mental hospital, given electroshock therapy. You and your brothers were taken to foster parents.

A. That was the most traumatic part of any of this. Living there with [my foster mother] who just was a very harsh disciplinarian, and just not a kind person.

Q. You struggled for years with anorexia. You said you couldn't escape it until you found a passion with work.

A. Not until I went to work in the medical examiner's office, and I think it's because I finally took control of my life. Eating disorders are very complicated, and one of the big factors is control. When people feel their lives are not in their control, they do other things to over-control.

And it is absolutely something you cannot will yourself to stop. They didn't understand eating disorders back in the day. Eating disorders and body dysmorphia, and if you ask me, it's a greater problem now than it was long ago.

Q. When you finally sought treatment, your social worker was sexually abusive.

A. I shouldn't say I don't forgive, but I don't forgive him. When you've got somebody at your mercy that way — and it was baloney, him saying this was just all part of the therapy. Those hospitals — you're at the mercy of what anybody decides they want to do.

Q. I also want to ask about your near-fatal car accident. After drinking and driving, you checked yourself into a treatment center in Newport, R.I. At the time, you were in talks with Demi Moore to play Scarpetta. But you weren't ready for an adaptation in 1993, you said.

A. [Drinking and driving] was a real act of stupidity. Part of what happened: at that point, stuff was happening so quickly. I'd gone from near-obscurity to running around with people like Demi Moore. I said, "You've got to figure out why you almost just killed yourself just when everything seems to be getting good."

That's what I reflected on for 30 days in Rhode Island. I was afraid that if I gave up Scarpetta, I wouldn't have her anymore. "Post-mortem" had just come out two years earlier. [An adaptation] felt like giving my power away.

When Demi Moore tried to get hold of me [after the accident], I had the plug pulled. In hindsight, I probably wasn't thinking clearly. I had a concussion. But I didn't have anybody to talk to, who could advise me: "Now is not a time to make a decision of this magnitude. You have a head injury. You're in a treatment center."

Q. This is an eye-opening look into your world. What do you hope readers take from it?

A. I want to encourage people. Some people think I was an instant success, or that I started out as a forensic pathologist. That's just not true: I'm a former journalist who wrote four books nobody wanted. But I maintain you can never amount to anything if you're not willing to fail. Nobody does it perfectly out of the gate.

And if you're so fortunate as to have such success, there's a downside. That's the yin and the yang of life.

BPL unveils winners of library card design contest

By Janira Skrbkova
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

In honor of Library Card Sign-Up Month, which kicks off Tuesday, the Boston Public Library challenged patrons to design library cards of their own.

In a contest that ran from May 15 to June 15 (a first for the BPL), entrants were encouraged to think about what the library means to them and base their designs on the motto "Free to All." They were then judged on creativity, artistic merit, and effective communication of the card's message.

BPL staff reviewed more than 400 entries across adult, teen, and youth age groups before selecting a design from each cohort, culminating in three new cards available Aug. 31 through 2027 while supplies last.

"We were overwhelmed with how many submissions we got, which was great," said Bailey Watroba, senior public relations associate for the BPL.

Elly Otharsson, winner in the adult age group, designed a vertically oriented card featuring the famously handsome BPL lobby.

"A library is a special place, especially this one. I've walked into this lobby with my niece so many times over the years, for story hour and for concerts in the courtyard. It never stops feeling magical," she told the BPL. "For this design, I was inspired by the magic of this iconic room: the staircase, the lions, the light, oh my! How lucky are we to call this library ours."

Carolyn Taylor, winner in the teen age group, designed a card featuring the library's pseudo-mascot.

"The lion on the card is inspired by the statues inside," she told the BPL. "Last year, when I was showing my out-of-town friend around Boston, she was amazed by the library lions and said they looked like guardians. That inspired me to turn the lion into a caring figure who protects the weak."

Julianna Peng, winner in the youth age group, designed a card inspired by Robert McCloskey's 1941 children's picture book "Make Way for Ducklings," a tale that follows Mr. and Mrs. Mallard and company as they set out for their forever home — the Boston Public Garden. Peng also featured a lobster (how could she not?), the Leonard P. Zakim Bunker Hill Memorial Bridge, and a BPL lion of her own.

"Big thanks to my mom, who helped me think of ideas and encouraged me to draw more even when I was tired," Peng told the BPL. "The library means 'Free to All.' 'Free to All' means that anybody can read the books, no matter who they are."

Winning designs by (clockwise from bottom left) Julianna Peng, from the youth age group; Carolyn Taylor, from the teen age group; and Elly Otharsson, from the adult age group.

New and existing cardholders can pick up the fresh designs at any BPL location with a picture ID and proof of Massachusetts residency (a Massachusetts ID satisfies both requirements).

"Although any month of the year is a great time to get a library card, this is a time when we push folks to get excited," Watroba said.

Clippers hit hard for cap violation

Team docked $30m, five first-rounders

By Beth Harris
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — Los Angeles Clippers owner Steve Ballmer was suspended for one year by the NBA, and the team was ordered to forfeit five first-round draft picks and pay a $30 million fine Wednesday for violating salary cap circumvention rules in a case involving Kawhi Leonard.

Also, president of basketball operations Lawrence Frank has been banned for six months and team president of business operations Gillian Zucker was suspended for one year. Leonard was hit with a $700,000 penalty.

The Clippers will give up a first-round pick each year from 2029-33.

The league came down hard on the organization after a nearly yearlong investigation led by an outside law firm.

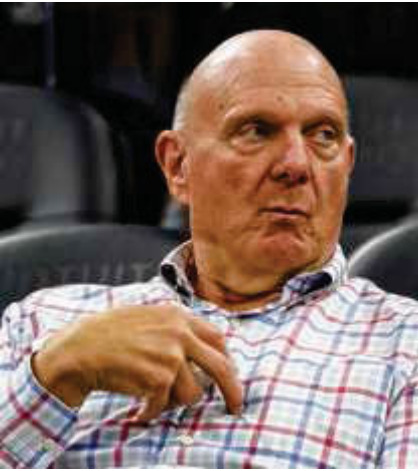

The Clippers had said multiple times that they had done nothing wrong and expected to be exonerated.

The team maintained that stance after the league's announcement.

“We vehemently reject the NBA’s findings, which are the result of a heavily biased investigation seeking to justify a predetermined narrative rather than facts and evidence,” the team said in a statement. “What the league told us privately differs from what it announced today publicly, and they have not held themselves close to the standard Commissioner [Adam] Silver set at the start of this investigation to ensure it’s fairness and accuracy.”

The Clippers said they will “now fight just as hard to demonstrate our innocence. We intend to vigorously challenge these findings and penalties through every avenue available to us and look forward to an ethical and impartial arbitration process.”

Among the lessons offered by the 2026 Red Sox season is a reminder of a baseball team’s capacity for extreme reversals.

For three months, the team scraped shocking depths. Then for two months, the Red Sox had a run of excellence rarely matched in franchise history. Now, as months dwindle to weeks and eventually the final days of a regular season that the team hopes is a prelude to postseason baseball, another switchback has occurred.

The Red Sox limped to a listless 8-3 loss to the Mariners on Wednesday, a defeat that was the team’s fourth in five games. In that span, the club has been outscored 50-21.

In contrast to the months-long offensive outage that characterized the start of the season, the current, brief skid is a product of a pitching staff derailment. The Red Sox have allowed at least eight runs in each of their last five games — just the fourth time in franchise history they’ve experienced such a downturn. (The prior instances came in 2020, 1930, and 1909.)

Lefthander Patrick Sandoval, meanwhile, continued a recent rotation downturn. He became the fourth straight Red Sox starter (along with Ranger Suarez, Payton Tolle, and Jedixson Paez) to allow at least four Vrabel expected to hear trash talk post-scandal

Mike Vrabel’s Patriots face quite a challenge in opening the NFL season next Wednesday, stepping immediately into the fire in the rematch of a painful and forgettable Super Bowl. The stakes are obviously lower this time around, but the environment might actually be tougher, played inside the very loud confines of a Seattle stadium that routinely sets records for crowd noise.

Can’t help but wonder how much of it will be aimed directly at the Patriots’ coach.

Vrabel’s tumultuous offseason was largely ignored throughout training camp, but it feels ripe for the taking for the Seahawks’ legendary fans, so effective they’ve had a 12th man jersey retired in their honor. There would be no shock if they bring up the apparent affair between the coach and reporter Dianna Russini, the salacious details of which took over the NFL discourse for the better part of a month. It was the loudest non-football story of the off-season.

It might be a stretch to suggest that a little trash talk from fans will affect the outcome of the game — who knows if Vrabel will even hear anything? — but it is more than fair to ask if the notorious spin in the tabloid crosshairs has an impact on the coach’s overall leadership profile.

Former Patriot Devin McCourty wondered as much during the broadcast of this year’s Hall of Fame Game, talking about what these Patriots might

Background check on Patriots’ roster

The Patriots will be quick to remind you last year’s Super Bowl appearance is in the rearview mirror. It’s a new team, and a new season. In that spirit, let’s meet the players with a mix of fun facts, analysis, and background into their lives and NFL journeys:

TE Tanner Arkin: He graduated from Illinois in May with a degree in kinesiology and hopes to be a physical therapist or strength coach following his playing career.

LS Julian Ashby: The Ashby family has deep roots in tennis; Ashby’s father, Glenton, played at Georgia Tech, and his uncle, Richard, played at face in Seattle, and who they turn to when things get tense. “They look for Mike Vrabel, they look to him when things get tough, do they still feel the same way?” McCourty said. “His character’s been tested. Will this team follow him wherever he goes? That’s going to be tested right away Week 1.”

It’s an unavoidable subplot in a season filled with them. The Patriots were the NFL’s feel-good story last season, their unexpected run to the Super Bowl channeling all the best echoes of the franchise’s dominant past. Behind the emergence of quarterback Drake Maye as a legitimate NFL star, the Patriots reclaimed the AFC East and went on a stirring playoff run. It ended in a haze of Maye sacks in Santa Clara, Calif., but the heady joyride nevertheless changed the conversation around them, raising expectations and removing any surprise factors.

Maybe that’s enough reason for the relatively muted version of Vrabel we’ve seen at the interview podium throughout training camp. Vrabel knows how hard it is to get a team back to the starting line. With a résumé both from a championship playing career and multiple playoff appearances as a head coach, he has to make sure players understand that a new season doesn’t pick up where the last one left off but requires a clean slate instead.

Any messiness encroaching on that clean slate is a threat to the team’s focus. When the messiness is his fault, it threatens his command of the room.

And make no mistake, Vrabel took command in his first year as strongly as any coach could. Who can forget the way he greeted every player coming off the field, sharing a hug or a handshake on the way into the locker room? Who can unsee the way he sprinted down the sideline, running alongside Antonio Gibson’s kickoff return for a touchdown in Miami? His profile, both literally and figuratively, was so large, well able to stand up in the six-time Super Bowl-winning shadow of Bill Belichick.

Super Bowl week was a celebration of all Vrabel accomplished, a reminder of how wrong the Titans were to let him go, a conversation around the way his personality was just the fit the Patriots needed after a yearlong failed experiment with Jerod Mayo. It was well earned, with Vrabel pushing just the right buttons and taking advantage of just the right breaks to get his team to a playoff run nobody saw coming.

It won’t be easy to repeat. As the coach himself said in camp, “Sustained success in the National Football League is tough, difficult. We know that the system isn’t set up for that.”

Neither is it set up to deal with distractions. Vrabel has mostly skirted consequences for his part in the scandal, at least professionally speaking. He missed the final two days of the draft for counseling with his family (and has pointedly complained about the team’s lack of depth since), but faced neither an NFL nor an internal team investigation. I could only find one question about it during camp, asked on Aug. 1: “You said this offseason that you were seeking counseling. I wanted to follow up on that and see what you learned from that counseling, and how did you balance that personal commitment with getting ready for this season?”

His answer did not use personal pronouns nor address personal growth. “I think we always look at improvement,” he said. “As we talk about getting ready for the next season, we always look at improvement and ways that we can improve individually and how we can improve as a team. It’s really critical that we continue to do that on and off the field.”

The challenge starts next Wednesday, in very unfriendly confines.

South Carolina and then on the ATP Tour.

DL Christian Barmore: Barmore is one of just four players remaining from the 2021 roster. The group also includes Rhamondre Stevenson, Hunter Henry, and Mike Onwenu.

K Andy Borregales: Borregales’s older brother, José, was also a kicker who was a first-team All-American in college and was with the Buccaneers for a short time.

WR A.J. Brown: Brown was the second player, after Kyler Murray, to play in both the Under Armour All-America Football Game and the Under Armour All-America Baseball Game, and he was drafted by the Padres as an outfielder in the 19th round in 2016.

OL Ben Brown: Brown comes from a long line of Ole Miss football players, including father Tim, paternal grandfather Allen (who was a first-team All-American and a two-time Super Bowl champion tight end with the Packers), maternal grandfather Bobby, and uncle Burkes.

S Kevin Byard: The veteran has twice led the league in interceptions (2017 with the Titans, and 2025 with the Bears).

T Will Campbell: Campbell is engaged to Ashlynn Nussmeier, the sister of former LSU teammate Garrett Nussmeier.

CB Channing Canada: With Canada making the team, the Patriots have now had at least one undrafted free agent on the initial roster in 22 of the last 23 seasons.

WR Efton Chism: Chism went to high school with singer-songwriter Benson Boone. The two sat a few seats apart in history class as seniors.

OL Dametrious Crownover: Crownover was recruited to Texas A&M as a tight end, and the offensive coaches say there was a tackle end-around pass in the Aggies’ playbook last year in hopes of taking advantage of Crownover’s powerful throwing arm.

CB Carlton Davis: Davis has made the playoffs in each of the last six seasons with three teams (Tampa Bay, Detroit, and New England).

QB Tommy DeVito: This summer, Mike Vrabel noted that DeVito’s new nickname is “Two Chains.” It’s a change from the “Tommy Cutlets” moniker he enjoyed the last several years.

WR Romeo Doubs: Doubs has distinguished himself as one of the quietest guys in the locker room and could end up being the most soft-spoken Patriots star since cornerback Stephon Gilmore.

WR DeMario Douglas: At 5 feet 8 inches, Douglas and Marcus Jones are the shortest players on the roster.

DT Cory Durden: Durden, who worked out this offseason with a number of pass-rushing defensive tackles, said his goal this season is to finish with at least five sacks.

LB Christian Elliss: Football runs deep in the Elliss family. Christian’s father is two-time Pro Bowl defensive lineman Luther Elliss, and brothers Kaden (Falcons) and Jonah (Broncos) also play in the NFL.

DT Joshua Farmer: After he lost both his parents at a young age, Farmer was raised by his 85-year-old grandmother, Ruby.

FB Reggie Gilliam: In his junior year at Toledo, Gilliam blocked four kicks.

CB Christian Gonzalez: Gonzalez enjoys cooking — he used to prepare Cajun seafood pasta for his teammates at Oregon — and has said if he wasn’t a football player, he might have gone to culinary school.

RB TreVeyon Henderson: Between his final season at Ohio State (16 games) and his first year with the Patriots (24 games, including preseason, regular season, and playoffs), Henderson played in 40 games over an 18-month span.

TE Hunter Henry: Entering his sixth season with the Patriots, Henry is one of only a handful of players left from the Bill Belichick era.

WR Mack Hollins: Hollins, who is committed to going barefoot whenever possible, said this summer that workers at some area restaurants have started to recognize him and have let him in even if he’s not wearing shoes.

LB Erick Hunter: Playing for Morgan State last season, Hunter was a finalist for the Buck Buchanan Award, presented annually to the national defensive player of the year in the Football Championship Subdivision.

LB Quintayvious Hutchins: He attended the same high school as Texans coach DeMeco Ryans.

OL Gabe Jacas: At Illinois last season, Jacas worked with former Patriots assistant coach and noted pass-rush expert Joe Kim.

DE Dre’Mont Jones: Jones sacked Drake Maye twice last year, once with the Titans, and once (following a midseason trade) with the Ravens.

CB Marcus Jones: Last month, Jones was named the Patriots’ Ron Burton Community Service Award winner for his continued commitment to the community and area charity work.

RB Corey Kiner: Kiner was recruited to play at Louisiana State by Patriots Hall of Fame running back (and former LSU assistant coach) Kevin Faulk.

TE Cameron Latu: Latu and Vrabel initially forged a bond when Vrabel was working as a consultant with the Browns in 2024.

OL Caleb Lomus: The first-round pick, born on Dec. 23, 2004, is the youngest player on the roster.

QB Drake Maye: The fathers of Maye and No. 3 quarterback Behren Morton were teammates in training camp with the Buccaneers in 1988.

QB Behren Morton: Morton became the first Texas Tech quarterback to throw for at least 2,500 yards in consecutive seasons with eight or fewer interceptions.

T Morgan Moses: Moses has coached his sons in youth football and has hinted about going into coaching full time after he retires.

LB Darius Muasau: The linebacker/special teamer played in 27 games with 18 starts over the last two seasons for the Giants, posting 102 total tackles, 1 sack, 1 interception, and 2 passes defended.

LB Namdi Obiazor: Obiazor’s younger brother, Chiddi, a defensive end, played for Kansas State. And his twin sister, Nneka, played basketball at Youngstown State, UNLV, and Grand Canyon.

OL Mike Onwenu: Onwenu led the Patriots’ offense in regular-season snaps played last year with 1,082 (98.9 percent).

S Dell Pettus: No Patriots played more special teams snaps during the 2025 regular season than Pettus (320, or 73 percent).

DE Elijah Ponder: Ponder majored in architectural engineering at Cal Poly.

CB Karon Prunty: Prunty, a Virginia native, ran track in high school against future Patriots teammate Henderson.

TE Eli Raridon: Like Maye, the 6-foot-6-inch Raridon was a high school basketball star. He earned second-team all-state honors at Valley High in West Des Moines, Iowa, as a junior power forward, averaging 17.5 points per game.

DB Jaylen Reed: Reed was a teammate of Colts cornerback Sauce Gardner at Detroit’s Martin Luther King Jr. High.

T Walter Rouse: Rouse is named after his grandfather, Walter Victor Rouse, who played basketball at Loyola University of Chicago, and made the winning shot in overtime to defeat Cincinnati in the 1963 NCAA championship game.

LB Robert Spillane: Spillane is the grandson of 1953 Heisman Trophy winner Johnny Lattner.

RB Rhamondre Stevenson: Stevenson is trying to become the first running back in Patriots history since James White with five straight seasons of 30 catches or more. White did it from 2015-19.

DT Leonard Taylor: Taylor was one of the unsung heroes of last season’s AFC title game, tipping a fourth-quarter field goal attempt from Broncos kicker Will Lutz.

OL Greg Van Roten: Van Roten, who graduated from Penn in 2012, is the only Ivy League alum on the roster.

OL Alijah Vera-Tucker: Vera-Tucker’s wife, Jessie, has a popular Instagram account that looks at the behind-the-scenes, family aspects of life in the NFL.

WR Kyle Williams: Among returning players, Williams’s 26.4 yards per kickoff return was best on the team (minimum 10 returns).

C Jared Wilson: Wilson made history last season as the first player to appear in a Super Bowl while wearing a guardian cap.

CB Charles Woods: Woods was one of nine Patriots who played at least 115 snaps on defense and 115 on special teams last season.

S Craig Woodson: Woodson last season became the first Patriots rookie to play at least 90 percent of the defensive snaps since Devin McCourty in 2010.

Raiders will start Cousins

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Kirk Cousins, as expected, will be the Raiders’ starting quarterback when they open the season at home Sept. 13 against the Dolphins, coach Klint Kubiak announced Wednesday.

Cousins ran the first-team offense nearly the entire pre-season with No. 1 draft pick Fernando Mendoza working mostly with the second unit.

The Raiders kept three quarterbacks; Aidan O’Connell returns for his fourth season.

“I’m really happy with all three of our quarterbacks,” Kubiak said. “Kirk’s had a really good offseason, a very good [training] camp, and he’s earned it.”

The Raiders signed Cousins, who enters his 15th season, to a two-year deal with $20 million in guaranteed money. His previous club, the Falcons, is responsible for $8.7 million this year.

Kubiak said running back Ashton Jeanty, injured in practice Aug. 23, could be ready to go in the opener. If not, rookie Mike Washington Jr. will start.

Mahomes on track

Patrick Mahomes appears on track to start for the Chiefs in Week 1 against the Broncos.

The two-time MVP has stated ever since he underwent surgery in December to repair torn ligaments in his left knee that his goal was to be on the field when the season begins.

And while doctors initially cautioned Mahomes that it could be October before he was ready to play, the quarterback surged past all expectations in his rehab, working with the first team throughout training camp.

By design, Mahomes did not play in any preseason games.

Jets audition kickers

Five-time All-Pro Justin Tucker was among a group of kickers who worked out for the Jets, who enter the season with some questions at the position.

Michael Badgley and Joshua Karty also were at the facility.

Tucker, 36, hasn’t kicked since the 2024 season after Baltimore released him in May 2025 after reports he was accused of inappropriate sexual behavior by massage therapists. He was suspended for 10 games.

Blake Grupe, claimed off waivers from Indianapolis on Monday, likely will be the first option for the Jets, who open at Tennessee on Sept. 13.

Bosa aims for Australia

Nick Bosa practiced with the 49ers for the first time since Aug. 3 and is confident he will play the opener in Australia vs. the Rams Sept. 10. Tight end George Kittle participated in his third straight practice and also appears ready to try to play in Week 1 as he returns from a ruptured Achilles tendon suffered in January, while receiver Mike Evans returned after missing time with an adductor injury . . . Former Patriots quarterback Joe Milton rejoined the Cowboys on the practice squad after losing his backup job to offseason pick-up Sam Howell . . . The Vikings signed 13-year outside linebacker and ex-Patriot Kyle Van Noy to their practice squad.

Woods pleads no contest, loses driver’s license for five years

By Daniel Kozin
ASSOCIATED PRESS

STUART, Fla. — Tiger Woods pleaded no contest to a reckless driving charge and his driver’s license was suspended for five years Wednesday following a March rollover crash in Florida, where he initially was accused of driving under the influence.

Woods, still one of golf’s most influential figures and as recognizable as any athlete in the world, has had a remarkable fall since winning the 2019 Masters for his 15th major. The first person of Black heritage to win the Masters in 1997, his career has been derailed by multiple back and knee surgeries, car crashes, and dependence on pain medication.

He was arrested in March after his SUV clipped a truck and rolled over on its side on a beachside residential road near his home on Jupiter Island. A sheriff’s report said deputies found two pain pills in Woods’s pocket and that he showed signs of impairment. He did a Breathalyzer test, which came out negative, but refused to take a urine test.

Woods pleaded not guilty to the original DUI charge.

Before the hearing in Florida’s Martin County on Wednesday, Woods, 50, sat at the defense table looking back at the mostly empty courtroom gallery. He said little as he agreed to the reduced charge and left the courthouse without addressing reporters.

He had arrived with his girlfriend, Vanessa Trump, President Trump’s former daughter-in-law. She sat behind him during the proceedings.

“Tiger is not absolved of accountability and he surrendered his license for the next five years,” Mark Steinberg, his longtime manager at Excel Sports told the AP. “He is continuing his treatment and prioritizing all aspects of his health.”

The prosecutor in the case said two toxicologists found there was insufficient proof of his impairment and determined Woods had built up a “pharmacological” tolerance after years of using pain pills.

Thomas Bakkedahl, a state attorney, defended his decision to accept the plea, saying, “I did what I think is right.”

Prosecutors obtained the golfer’s pharmacy records that showed he had a lawful prescription, Bakkedahl said.

The deputy who arrested Woods after the crash found two white pills in his pocket that had markings identifying them as hydrocodone, according to the arrest report. Hydrocodone is an opioid that is prescribed for pain, but it can be addictive. Woods told the deputy he takes a few prescription medications, according to the report, including “Vicodin” — a brand name painkiller that contains hydrocodone.

He has had numerous surgeries on his legs and back.

At Wednesday’s hearing, Woods also pleaded no contest to refusing to submit to testing after the crash and was fined $1,500, according to court documents. A no-contest plea is not an admission of guilt, but means the accused will offer no defense. The plea is treated as a conviction in the criminal justice system.

Woods’s attorney had not responded to a message seeking comment.

Judge Darren Steele warned Woods his driver’s license suspension didn’t include exceptions. The prosecutor said he was confident Woods would be spotted if he doesn’t heed the message.

“Of all the people in the world who should not get behind the wheel of a car, it’s one of the most recognizable people on the planet,” Bakkedahl said.

But there’s one vehicle Woods still can drive, at least in Florida — a golf cart. That’s because Florida law says as long you are at least 18, you can operate a golf cart without a license. And that applies to anyone, Bakkedahl said in an email, whether you’re on a golf course or public property.

RED SOX NOTEBOOK

Rutschman sits for third game in a row

By Tim Healey
GLOBE STAFF

Adley Rutschman was out of the Red Sox' lineup for a third consecutive day Wednesday because of a right elbow issue, a wrinkle ahead of the catcher's return to Baltimore Thursday.

"It's improving, just not fully comfortable yet putting him back in there," interim manager Chad Tracy said before the Red Sox' 8-3 loss to the Mariners.

"Hopeful for [Thursday], but each day we're getting a little bit better. So we're trying to do our best due diligence. Can we get him to a better place and then go? Just not quite there yet."

Tracy added that there is "still optimism" that the injury will heal without Rutschman needing to go on the injured list. Before the game, he played catch, a test of the throwing arm that has bothered him.

Rutschman characterized it as "trending in the right direction," despite frustration. He has started just three of the past nine games.

The Red Sox' series opener with the Orioles on Thursday marks Rutschman's first time back in Baltimore, one month after his original club traded him. He was the No. 1 draft pick in 2019 and played five years with the Orioles.

What feelings swirl for such an occasion?

"We'll see. I don't know. It's going to be interesting," Rutschman said. "Just talking to the guys who have kind of done that in the past, I'm sure there will be a lot of emotions inside. We'll see."

Pitchers progressing

Garrett Crochet and Tanner Houck, potential pitching reinforcements, are making concrete progress in their attempts to return.

Crochet (left shoulder injury) will throw his first bullpen session Friday, Tracy said. That is a step up from what he called "mound catch" earlier in the week.

Houck (Tommy John surgery last year) is recovering well after another appearance in a scrimmage-type game in Fort Myers, Fla. He is due to start a rehab assignment with Double-A Portland next week.

Rafaela exits early

Ceddanne Rafaela left after the sixth inning because of quadriceps tightness, per Tracy.

The center fielder wanted to continue to play, but with the lopsided score, the Red Sox decided it wasn't worth it.

"We'll check in with him tonight, tomorrow, and see where he's at," Tracy said. "But didn't want him running back out there with a tight quad in an 8-1 game."

Contreras on mend

After playing with a troublesome left hamstring for about a month, first baseman Willson Contreras reached a tipping point Saturday at Yankee Stadium, after he legged out a triple.

When he woke up "really sore" the next day, he approached Sox decision-makers about a stay on the injured list, he said.

"I saw that the ball [in the right-field corner], I had a chance to get to third base, and I didn't hesitate to get the triple," Contreras said Wednesday, in his first comments since landing on the IL. "The best play was to stay at second base, but I'm a gamer."

If this were the playoffs, he added, he would keep playing. But for now, it makes sense to rest up. He said he feels "a lot better" after just a few days off and remains optimistic about a speedy return.

"Been working with the trainers — they're not leaving

Head to head: This is the fourth and final series. Boston is 5-4 vs. Baltimore this season.

Miscellany: With a 69-71 record after winning 8 of 12, the Orioles are 1½ games back in the hunt for the final American League wild-card ... Baltimore outfielders Tyler O'Neill (shoulder) and Christian Franklin (hand) are on the 10-day injured list ... The Orioles claimed outfielder Luis Robert from the Mets on Monday ... Baltimore is 17-22 against division opponents this season.

Pitching rotation hits rough patch runs, the first time since July 2022 that the team reeled off four straight outings of such pronounced mediocrity.

"It's pretty surprising, but it's baseball. There's ups and downs," Sandoval said of the recent teamwide pitching woes. "It's not always going to be rainbows [and] unicorns. Sometimes things are going to be cloudy and rainy."

There is context to the inclement weather pattern.

The Sox' rotation depth was stretched by a doubleheader against the Yankees on Saturday (with a night game covered by a bullpen game). That fact, combined with a decision to skip Sonny Gray's scheduled start on Tuesday in an effort to provide the veteran with a late-season breather, resulting in a call-up for righthander Paez.

Paez had just recently reached Triple-A, and his stuff is too light to withstand any command wobbles at the big league level. Against the Mariners, he wobbled – an outcome that, if not preordained, wasn't entirely shocking.

"You don't want to say, 'Yeah, I expected turbulence.' You hope everybody goes out there and throws well," said interim manager Chad Tracy. "[But] when you're looking at it, you know that there's going to be a pen game there, and then there's going to be a spot start there. I guess maybe [it's] more of a stretch [where] you feel like you don't know exactly what's going to happen or what you're going to get versus when we're really settled in the rotation."

Barring a historic collapse — difficult to fathom given the sorry state of the American League — the stretch likely represents an inconsequential blip. With 22 games left, the Sox still reside in a sufficiently secure position that anything outside of a four-game sweep at the hands of the Orioles this weekend seems likely to keep them on a flight pattern for the playoffs with minimal turbulence. Even after Wednesday's loss, FanGraphs still pegs the Sox as having a 97 percent likelihood of reaching the postseason.

Even so, the Red Sox are eager to reestablish the strengths that carried them back from their nadir into sturdy playoff position, and in both recent days and weeks, the team hasn't done much flexing. The club has gone 2-6 over the last week, and 12-14 over the last four weeks while losing five of eight series.

"We've struggled. We've definitely struggled," said Tracy. "But certainly the season ebbs and flows. We're going through a little bit of a rough patch there, but if we string together some good starts, we'll be in good shape."

Over the coming four-game weekend series against the Orioles (who are tied for fourth place in the wild-card standings, six games behind the Sox), the Red Sox will be able to get back on turn in their rotation, with Jake Bennett, Suarez, Gray, and Tolle all scheduled to take the ball while trying to help the team regain its footing.

"You get through [the patchwork stretch] and then hopefully you get on the other side of it and get everything settled in the rotation and get on a run here," said Tracy.

While some of the struggles are circumstantial, others run deeper — foremost the ineffectiveness of Suarez (5.01 ERA, 16 percent strikeout rate, 9 percent walk rate) since his return from a hamstring injury after the All-Star break.

There is no real panic for the Red Sox about the recent extreme struggles of the pitching staff so much as an eagerness for a return to form. All season, and particularly through their summer surge, the Red Sox were led by a rotation that provided consistent quality – and often excellence, something that has made the current skid a bit disorienting.

The larger performance of the group to this point of the season affords the team confidence that the rotation's recent struggles are temporary — even if the extremes of the 2026 season serve as a warning not to take even brief wobbles lightly.

Jarren Duran's popup in the fourth was part of an 0-for-4 day that included a throwing error.

Red Sox getting sloppy, lose again to Mariners — Thursday in Baltimore.

"I was OK with it," interim manager Chad Tracy said of the early but fateful send. "Obviously, Mickey doesn't run well, but as you're watching that unfold — it's obviously shallow enough, it wasn't hit hard, so [Arozarena] is coming in. But [Gasper] had two or three steps around third before [Arozarena] had actually gotten to that ball, so it's going to force a good throw. He made a good throw.

"Again, with no outs, might think differently. With one out, trying to get a run on the board."

Also sinking the Red Sox were bad days for lefthander Patrick Sandoval (four-plus innings, four runs), righthander Brayan Bello (three innings, four runs), and Jarren Duran (0 for 4, throwing error).

Duran's most noteworthy at-bat came in the fourth, when he stepped up with two on and one out, a chance for the Red Sox (75-65) to make the game interesting. He popped up a hanging splitter, then screamed several expletives, audible throughout a mostly full but mostly quiet Fenway Park. Later, Duran grounded into a double play and lined out to the warning track in right field.

The Mariners (66-74), who entered the series as the lowest-scoring team in the majors, totaled 25 runs in 28 innings.

This time, the Red Sox matched the Mariners with a dozen hits.

"We actually are swinging the bats pretty good," Tracy said. "We're getting a lot of traffic."

A highlight for the Red Sox: Roman Anthony, who went 3 for 5 and hit his second home run of the year (and his first as a member of the starting lineup, first at Fenway, and first since April 1).

In four games since returning from a nearly four-month stint on the injured list, he is 9 for 18 with four extra-base hits.

"It's like a new season in a sense for me. It's felt like I've missed a year," Anthony said. "So with the time off and getting a chance to kind of turn the page and enter that mode of ... now being September, it's just doing everything I can to help the team win. Not that that isn't always the goal, but I think when you get closer to the end of the year, you start to realize that nothing matters anymore except for winning."

Seattle righthander Bryce Miller tossed 4⅔ innings, scattering seven hits and a walk to hold the Sox to one run. Trevor Story's double in the fourth inning brought in Wilyer Abreu, who also had doubled.

It made for an underwhelming performance against Miller, whom the Mariners bumped from their rotation less than a week ago, only to have to turn to him immediately because of an injury to Emerson Hancock.

Sandoval dug the Red Sox an early hole with a 31-pitch mess in the third inning.

Back-to-back singles from Weston Wilson and J.P. Crawford put runners on the corners with no outs. Sandoval's wild pitch scored Wilson and moved Crawford to second. After a pair of infield outs, Sandoval walked Dominic Canzone — and blew an automated ball-strike challenge on ball four.

Julio Rodriguez smoked an RBI single to center for the second run. When Josh Naylor flared an RBI single to left field for the third, Duran's airmailed throw over third base allowed a fourth run to score.

Naylor went on to steal third base uncontested, with Sandoval not holding him on, but Sandoval induced a fly out from Taylor Ward to end the misery.

"Just fighting myself the whole game, getting myself into bad counts," Sandoval said.

Bello handled three innings but got smacked around for four runs — all in the sixth — and seven hits. Jhonny Pereda's two-run single with the bases loaded and nobody out was the biggest blow.

"Not to put any excuse out there or anything like that, I knew the bullpen was thin so I offered myself to pitch today and I felt really good," Bello, who was on three days of rest after throwing 94 pitches Saturday, said through an interpreter. "It's just things that happen."

Rockies get 11th-inning walkoff win vs. Orioles

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Brett Sullivan's two-out, two-run single capped an 11th-inning comeback for the Rockies in a 6-5 victory over the Orioles on Wednesday in Denver.

The loss was a blow to Baltimore in its battle for the final American League wild-card spot. The Orioles (69-71), who host the Red Sox in a big four-game series beginning Thursday night, went 6-3 on their trip out West, but they dropped the final two against the Rockies and fell two games behind the Guardians for the last playoff berth.

The Orioles took a 5-3 lead in the 11th on RBI singles by Samuel Basallo and Blaze Alexander, who finished with three hits, but the Rockies rallied against Grant Wolfram (6-3). TJ Rumfield drove in Connor Norby before Wolfram struck out Cole Carrigg and Zac Veen.

Adael Amador hit a ground-rule double to left. Sullivan then blooped a 3-2 sinker into left, and Amador easily beat the throw home.

The Orioles squandered Trevor Rogers's career-high 11 strikeouts when the Rockies tied it with two outs in the ninth off Andrew Kittredge.

Guerrero powers Blue Jays

Vladimir Guerrero Jr. hit a three-run homer and had a season-high five RBIs, Dylan Cease scattered four hits over six innings and the Blue Jays routed the Guardians, 11-0, in Cleveland.

The Guardians remain in the third AL wild-card position, but their lead over the Blue Jays, Orioles, and Rangers was sliced to 1½ games.

Mets' rookie dazzles vs. Rays

Rookie Nick Morabito had a three-run double for his first major league hit and later made a sparkling defensive play in left field, helping the Mets defeat the Rays, 10-4, in St. Petersburg, Fla.

Morabito, who entered as a pinch runner for Mark Vientos in the sixth inning, came up with two outs and the bases loaded in the seventh and slashed a 2-2 pitch from Manuel Rodríguez down the left-field line to turn the Mets' two-run lead into a 9-4 advantage.

In the eighth, Victor Mesa Jr. sent a sinking liner to left that Morabito chased down and made a diving catch to end the inning. Morabito, who started his big league career hitless in his first 12 at-bats, added a single in the ninth.

Giants' Devers hits 32nd HR

Rafael Devers continued his hot hitting with his 32nd home run of the season and the Giants scored twice in the 10th inning to defeat the Pirates, 5-4, in Pittsburgh.

Devers had a solo shot with one out in the first inning to open the scoring a night after the Giants dropped a wild 13-12 decision in the series opener. The first baseman extended his hitting streak to 10 games by going 2 for 3 with two walks.

Bryce Eldridge's RBI double down the left-field line in the 10th inning put the Giants ahead 4-3 and Turner Hill added a sacrifice fly. Both runs came off Camilo Doval (3-2), who led the National League with 39 saves for the Giants in 2023.

Brewers rally against Cubs

Jackson Chourio homered and the Brewers beat the Cubs, 9-5, in Chicago, overcoming a shaky performance by Jacob Misiowski, who allowed five runs and five hits in four innings. The front-runner for the NL Cy Young Award surrendered three earned runs or fewer in his first 25 starts this year.

William Contreras hit a tiebreaking RBI single as Milwaukee won for the sixth time in eight games, improving to a major league-best 87-53.

Chourio had four of the Brewers' 14 hits and scored twice.

The Cubs dropped nine games behind the Brewers in the NL Central. Alex Bregman homered and drove in four runs for Chicago, which lost for the third time in four games.

Acuña Jr. fastest to 200/200

Ronald Acuña Jr. hit a three-run homer to become the fastest player in history to reach 200 home runs and 200 stolen bases, and the Braves beat the Nationals, 9-0, in Washington. Sean Murphy homered for the third time in five games, a three-run shot in the sixth inning that broke a scoreless tie. The game was interrupted by a lengthy rain delay in the fourth. Acuña followed with a drive to left-center in the seventh, his 14th of the season, to make it 6-0. He needed 904 games to reach the 200/200 club. Alfonso Soriano set the previous record at 929 games. . . . The Dodgers were uncertain whether designated hitter Shohei Ohtani will pitch again this season. The two-way superstar hasn't pitched in a game since July 3 because of lingering pain in his left knee and right biceps. Ohtani threw a 20-pitch bullpen session last Friday but was scratched from a potential start against the Tigers in Detroit two days later.

Minutemen have nowhere to go but up

By Amin Touri
GLOBE STAFF

For as much ambition as coach Joe Harasymiak may have for his UMass football team, he's also got some unbridled honesty. That may be the only way to operate for Harasymiak, who is heading into his second year at the helm in Amherst after a dismal 0-12 season in which the Minutemen lost those 12 games (including one to FCS school Bryant) by an average score of 39-11.

UMass rarely registers on the national college football scale, but when it did so last season — its first since moving back to the Mid-American Conference — it was for all the wrong reasons.

There was the last-minute meltdown against Buffalo, when the Minutemen looked to have sealed a rare FBS win with an interception with 59 seconds to go while clinging to a 1-point lead, but still couldn't close it out thanks in part to an untimely penalty.

"That was one of the most stupid things I've ever seen in my life," Harasymiak said at the time. "I've got to go coach it. It's my problem. It's my fault."

Then there was the viral moment in November when fireworks were set off over the stadium following a fourth-quarter field goal — one that cut the Minutemen's deficit to 45-3 in a loss to Northern Illinois.

UMass hasn't beaten an FBS school since a 21-14 upset at Army Oct. 28, 2023. The Minutemen haven't defeated one at home since a 27-13 win over UConn Oct. 9, 2021, the only highlight of a 1-11 season.

So is the goal just to get another FBS win on the board? Not quite.

"I think when you talk about goals and success in terms of like, 'Hey, let's just go out and get a first FBS win since '23. Hey, let's go out and win a first home FBS game since '21,' I mean, that would be pretty deflating if I was a player in the room talking about that," Harasymiak said.

"We want to go out and compete for MAC championships and go to great bowl games. That's the plan here. That's why I got hired. It's never too early to do that."

If UMass is going to make that jump, a lot is riding on the shoulders of Virginia Tech transfer William "Pop" Watson III, a high school star at Springfield Central.

Watson, the 2022 Gatorade Massachusetts Player of the Year, never quite got his shot at Virginia Tech, where he completed 36 of 63 passes for 558 yards and one touchdown in 11 games over three seasons, but can be a much bigger fish in a smaller pond in Amherst.

The Minutemen were a disaster under center last year, with four quarterbacks combining for 1,981 passing yards, 8 touchdowns, and 9 interceptions, and a passer rating of 98.856 in 12 games for the least-productive offense in college football.

"This goes from the pros on down: You have to have a dude at that spot," Harasymiak said. "The best thing about recruiting is when both parties align on what they want. . . . We needed a quarterback. Bad. Our quarterback play was atrocious last year. No leadership. It was a revolving door. Gave everybody an opportunity. Didn't happen.

"We know we need to fix that. We feel like we've done that."

Harasymiak has authored a turnaround before, taking Maine from a 3-8 team in 2015 to a 10-4 squad with a Colonial Athletic Association championship before his departure for Minnesota in 2018. But the job he did in Orono, Maine, was on a different scale from the long-running futility at UMass, where the Minutemen have gone 8-68 since 2019.

The second-year coach openly talks about the wrong turns of the last decade, as the program stumbled through its elevation to FBS, a few years in the wilderness as an independent, and struggles to get to grips with the NIL and transfer portal era. But it sounds less like a man hoping to blame his predecessors and more like a coach that has little choice but to accept where the program is, with a little optimism mixed in.

"Now I sit here with all the things that I've been promised throughout the interview process, and we're getting them," Harasymiak said. "And I feel like for the first time with this team being in the portal and the NIL era, we're able to be at the group of six level. . . . We should go out and be able to compete and raise the standards for our program."

There's no easing into the season for the Minutemen, who head to Rutgers for their opener on Thursday (6 p.m., Big Ten Network).

The expectations, at least, are low. For the team that has brought up the rear of college football for the last seven years, there's nowhere to go but up.

US OPEN

Sabalenka, Alcaraz move to third round

By Brian Mahoney

ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Aryna Sabalenka came to the US Open struggling and in danger of losing the No. 1 ranking.

She heads to the third round looking every bit ready for a threepeat.

The top-seeded Sabalenka overwhelmed Polina Iatcenko 6-1, 6-1 in 53 minutes on Wednesday night, putting on a power-hitting display that made it seem her recent problems are in the past.

A number of players have only finished one match.

Another rainy afternoon in New York suspended play for a time on outside courts, allowing action only under the roofs in Arthur Ashe Stadium and Louis Armstrong Stadium to continue uninterrupted. So the players scheduled there avoided the starts and stops that others faced.

Carlos Alcaraz was one, following Sabalenka with a 4-6, 6-0, 6-3, 6-2 victory over Jaime Faria. The defending champion rebounded after dropping a set, which he didn't do until last year's final, by winning the next eight games to seize control.

Jessica Pegula needed only 56 minutes to defeat Sofia Kenin 6-3, 6-1. Kenin, the 2020 Australian Open champion, beat Venus Williams in her first match.

"To be out of there in under an hour, it doesn't always happen," Pegula said. "So I think I'm just going to take that one and run, I guess, until the next round."

No. 8 seed Ben Shelton followed Pegula on Ashe and beat Hubert Hurkacz 6-3, 5-7, 7-6 (3), 7-5, while No. 7 Daniil Medvedev raced past Sebastian Gorzny — except for a brief delay to protest the chair umpire's decision to replay a point when two birds sat on the net — 6-3, 6-3, 7-5.

When the US Open switched to a

Sunday start last year, it spread out the first round over the first three days, so Wednesday would have arrived with everyone playing in the second round had the weather cooperated.

It hadn't.

Alex de Minaur, the No. 6 seed from Australia, said with all the juggling his match was moved twice from the court where he was originally scheduled. He finally started his US Open on Wednesday on Court 11 and beat Italy's Andrea Guerrieri 6-2, 6-2, 6-4.

Paula Badosa said she didn't even know how to prepare for the resumption of her match against Daria Kasatkina, which was halted Tuesday with her one game from winning to set up a second-round match against No. 4 Coco Gauff.

At least she got through. No. 12 Rafael Nadal, the 19-year-old from Spain who came in after a strong summer, was routed 6-2, 6-1, 6-1 by Bu Yunchaokete of China when his first-round match was finally completed.

The first round was finally completed late Wednesday, a day when 25 men's singles matches were scheduled to get the tournament back on track.

Alex Michelsen pulled off an upset in one of them by ousting fellow American Brandon Nakashima, the No. 16 seed, 6-3, 6-4, 6-4. No. 11 Frances Tiafoe beat Japanese qualifier Rei Sakamoto in straight sets, and Argentina's Mariano Navone backed up his upset of Novak Djokovic by beating Matteo Berrettini 3-6, 6-3, 6-4, 7-6 (4).

Wimbledon champion Linda Noskova and runner-up Karolina Muchova advanced to the third round, while No. 11 Marta Kostyuk got past 2017 US Open champion Sloane Stephens 6-1, 7-5. No. 31 seed Leylah Fernandez set up a matchup of past US Open runners-up against Pegula, with the winner to meet either No. 16 Sorana Cirstea or No. 19 Jasmine Paolini.

Bertrand being treated for cancer

Marc Bertrand, co-host of 98.5 The Sports Hub's midday show, announced near the end of Wednesday's program that he is being treated for cancer. Bertrand, who has been paired with Scott Zolak on the "Zolak and Bertrand" program since February 2015, said he was diagnosed with papillary thyroid cancer a couple of months ago. Bertrand, 41, said he is having an ablation procedure at Mass Eye and Ear to "kill my tumor" this week and is aiming to be back on the air next Wednesday, the day the Patriots open the regular season. "It's the most common type of thyroid cancer and it is highly treatable so before anybody starts to worry about me — especially Zo, he loves to worry about me a lot — you can rest assured it's gonna be fine," said Bertrand, who has been with the station since its 2009 launch. "It is treatable, I am an excellent hands, and I am expecting this to soon be behind me in a short amount of time." Bertrand said he initially did not intend to talk about his diagnosis on the air. But he chose to, he said, because he wanted to emphasize the importance of getting screened for cancer, something the show's hosts have discussed before. "I have no symptoms, that is not why I discovered this," said Bertrand, who noted a screening years ago alerted him and his doctor that a future cancer diagnosis was a possibility.

WTGL inks broadcast deal

When women's golf begins its tech-forward chapter with the introduction of the WTGL in November, fans across the country will be able to tune in thanks to a national broadcast deal. The WTGL, the new women's division of the tech-driven indoor golf league that launched in 2025, will tee off Nov. 8 and will air nationally on ESPN platforms (ABC, ESPN, and ESPN2) and ION. The full Season 1 schedule and production details haven't been announced. ION — a free, multiplatform network — has positioned itself as one of the foremost broadcast platforms for women's sports. In addition to the WTGL, its partners include the WNBA, NWSL, PWHL, and Major League Volleyball. TGL and WTGL is a hybrid virtual golf setup that features the world's best players in a team format, hitting into a massive screen at the SoFi Center in Palm Beach Gardens, Fla., where every match is contested. Boston will be represented in WTGL by Boston Common Golf, which also has one of the six original men's teams.

Rangers sign Tolvanen

The Rangers agreed to terms with winger Eeli Tolvanen on a one-year, $1.5 million contract. The Rangers and Tolvanen reached the deal with a little more than two weeks before the start of training camp. Tolvanen is coming off a 36-point season with Seattle, skating in 78 of 82 games. He set career highs with 23 goals in 2024-25 and 41 points in '23-24. . . . Amazon's Prime Video will be the exclusive local streaming home of six NHL teams this season as part of a multiyear agreement announced by the league. Defending Stanley Cup champion Carolina, Anaheim, Columbus, Dallas, Minnesota, and St. Louis will have their games on the platform in their markets. . . . Lambeau Field will host college hockey for the first time in more than two decades when the Wisconsin men face Michigan and the Wisconsin women take on Ohio State in a Feb. 20 doubleheader.

State probes Simmons's illegal proxy betting

By Michael Silverman

GLOBE STAFF

The Massachusetts Gaming Commission is investigating an apparent admission of proxy sports betting by Bill Simmons, the Boston-bred sportswriter and cultural critic.

Simmons lives in California, where sports betting is not legal.

On his podcast Sunday, Simmons laid out in detail why and how he recently asked the Massachusetts-based boyfriend of his daughter to place bets on Simmons's Massachusetts FanDuel account.

Allowing another person access to a sports betting account, or proxy betting, is illegal in Massachusetts and is forbidden by FanDuel, which is a sponsor of Simmons's The Ringer media platform.

"We are aware of that activity, it is sitting with the proper staff members in this building," said Mass. Gaming Commission chair Jordan Maynard on Tuesday. "I am very careful — as chair of the commission, I have the power to hold hearings and so I don't ever want to prejudice a matter that hasn't come before me.

"I'm not trying to be cagey. It's here at the commission. We're aware of it, and we'll take whatever actions we have to take."

A FanDuel spokesperson said that in addition to voiding the bets, it also responded by "actioning the account," a phrase that could mean that Simmons's FanDuel account has been suspended or faces suspension.

"We became aware of the issue and handled it consistent with our terms and conditions and Massachusetts Gaming Commission regulations, including reporting the matter to the MGC, voiding the bets, and actioning the account," read the FanDuel statement.

Asked to clarify what "actioning" could entail, the spokesperson said it is FanDuel's policy not to comment on individual actions. Asked for examples of what actions could be included, the spokesperson sent a link to MGC regulations.

The terms and conditions spell out, in part, that any registered sports bettor in Massachusetts is required to acknowledge that they are prohibited from allowing any other person to access or use their sports wagering account, and that unless there is a pending investigation, the sports betting operator can suspend or close any account.

The regulation also says an account "shall be suspended" when an operator has evidence that indicates "the patron has violated the account's terms and conditions."

Simmons addressed the issue on his podcast Tuesday night, saying it was a "lesson learned" for him, that he was unaware that "apparently" proxy betting is not allowed. He added a joke that not only were his bets voided, but that his daughter will now have to break up with her boyfriend.

Simmons said he will be back in Boston and "maybe at some point I'll make some more wagers down the road. There you go. Lesson learned."

Here's the full snippet of Simmons's remarks: "I talked about how I got my daughter's boyfriend to place some bets for me in Massachusetts because I was in L.A. Did not know about the proxy rules. Yeah, there are some real rules with this stuff and they've ruled that not only are the bets going to be voided — and I learned my lesson, apparently proxy betting not allowed,

I actually thought it was, but that's fine — and now my daughter has to break up with her boyfriend, that was the other thing. No, I'm kidding, they're going to stay together. But yeah, I did learn, not allowed to do that. So, all those bets went out the window, all that special time I had with Hank out the window, as well. The good news is I'm going to be in Boston and maybe at some point I'll make some more wagers down the road. There you go. Lesson learned."

After first saying he was not going to talk about some "moves" he had to make to place some bets a month ago, Simmons decided to talk this past Sunday on his podcast:

"My daughter's boyfriend, Hank, who's a great kid, both turned 21 this summer, as did my daughter, and FanDuel is in Massachusetts obviously and there was a couple of bets I really wanted to get in," said Simmons. "I wanted . . . there was UCLA overs, but Houston, the market had not shifted appropriately yet. I can't have my daughter do it. My dad would have no idea how to do it. But Hank, I really trust Hank. I let Hank log into my FanDuel as me. I get the code to make sure it's me to my phone. I give him the code. He logs in, and I have all this money that I had from last year because I actually hit a bunch of futures last year, and he's putting in bets for me and, honestly, it was the closest I've ever felt to Hank."

"It's a real bonding moment for us. A week later, called him up and ran it back. We did some more."

►CLIPPERS

The NBA opened the investigation in September 2025 into whether a $28 million endorsement contract between Leonard and Aspiration Fund Adviser LLC — a company that filed for bankruptcy last year — broke league rules, following a report by podcast journalist Pablo Torre. Earlier this year, Aspiration co-founder Joseph Sanberg was sentenced to 14 years in federal prison after pleading guilty to defrauding investors and lenders of at least $248 million.

"I accept full responsibility for lapses in judgment by people within my inner circle and regret the distraction this situation has caused the fans and my family," Leonard said in a statement issued through his new agent, Harrison Gaines.

The NBA said Leonard, through his former business manager and uncle Dennis Robertson, "violated the circumvention rules by pressuring the Clippers to assist him in obtaining off-court income opportunities, successfully obtaining those opportunities, and failing to reimburse payments by the Clippers for personal expenses."

"I entered into my contract with the Clippers as well as the agreements in question in good faith, fully committed to fulfilling my obligations and with no knowledge of any intent on anyone's part to circumvent the salary cap," Leonard added.

The league said Ballmer was suspended for "knowingly seeking to help Mr. Leonard obtain off-court income opportunities," among other issues.

Leonard's trade to the Raptors has been on hold pending the outcome of the investigation. Toronto had said it still wants Leonard, who appears just as eager to return to the team with whom he won an NBA title in 2019, when he was Finals MVP.

"As I return to Toronto, I am focused on what I can control, closing this chapter, and moving forward with a clean slate," Leonard said in his statement.

Under coach Jodi Klein's watchful eye, Franklin looks to return to the Division 1 final.

Franklin's fire fueled by loss in D1 championship

By Henry Dinh-Price
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Following a midseason turnaround that resulted in a trip to the Division 1 championship, Franklin fell short at the final hurdle.

Left feeling unsatisfied, the Panthers, ranked seventh in the preseason Globe Top 20, are rallying around the goal of getting back to the final, and ultimately changing the outcome.

"We all know we missed an opportunity to take a state championship last year," said coach Jodi Klein.

There's also a sense of pride in what was achieved last year.

"It's upsetting because it's a state final, but at least we made it there," said junior forward Lily Strong.

"Don't get us wrong, we still think about it," said junior center-back Grace Marinella. "But it makes us want to go back and win."

That feeling is spurred by an underwhelming 3-4-1 start last fall, punctuated by an 8-2 loss to eventual Division 3 champion Medfield.

Klein and her players agree that lopsided loss was their turning point. The change was immediately felt at the following practice, and the Panthers went 12-2-1 down the stretch, winning the Hockomock League.

"We realized we couldn't just walk through it, and we actually had to put in the work if we wanted to see results," said senior co-captain midfielder Laila Rosen.

The Panthers graduated All-Scholastic midfielder Morgan Lovell and All-EMass second-team center back Cassidy Carmignani, but still have plenty of returning talent.

Strong, who netted 21 goals as a sophomore forward, will be key to Franklin's offensive efforts. Recently committed to Fairfield, she is fast and powerful.

In the midfield, filling Lovell's role has come naturally. Rosen, senior Sophia Horton, and senior BB Vallee are all team captains providing leadership in the center of the field.

Junior midfielder Anna Carosi is also a key piece, showcasing a forceful shot and a willingness to commit to challenges.

"She's a tiny powerhouse of a player who is going to have a huge impact for us this year," Klein said.

On the backline, the junior pairing of Marinella, who recently committed to UMass Amherst, and Beth Rappa looks stingy.

Rappa, who is filling the spot vacated by Carmignani, is a vocal leader in the back. At the Acton-Boxborough jamboree last weekend, she never came off the field.

"She really just commanded the back, and I'm excited to see what she's going to do this season," said Klein.

Junior winger Phoebe Cuneo will be impactful in the attack. She is a speedy forward who has improved her technical skills immensely.

On the other wing, senior Fiona Stuehler and junior Claire Michel are both coming off ACL injuries and could be impactful.

Stuehler made JV as a freshman before suffering back-to-back ACL tears, and Michel tore her ACL last fall but looks quick and springy despite the use of a bulky knee brace.

Senior Sophia Horton will help lock down the midfield for Franklin, which opens the season at No. 7 in the Globe's Top 20 poll.

JONATHAN WIGGS/GLOBE STAFF

Juniors Liv Cotte and Devyn Cairns will split time in net after splitting time between JV and varsity last fall.

"They've both really shined and looked great through the preseason," Klein said.

As the Panthers gear up for the regular season, their first goal is to repeat as Hockomock champion. Nonleague games against Natick and Medfield are also circled.

"I want to beat Natick so bad," said Marinella.

"No, I'm excited for our Med-field game," Strong responded.

But ultimately, winning a state title is what this group has set out accomplish.

"It was right at our fingertips," said Klein. "So there's no reason to believe that this group can't get back to where we were last year."

Corner kicks

■ Belmont finally made its breakthrough last fall. After consecutive first-round upsets in 2023 and 2024, the Marauders advanced to the Division 1 semi-finals, upsetting top-seeded Needham in the quarterfinals before losing to eventual champion Natick.

Coach Jemmy Cange says that run leaves his group even more excited for the upcoming season.

"They did get a little taste of winning and what it takes," said Cange. "They're all excited to get the season going and try to repeat what we had."

Despite returning seven starters, Belmont faces the challenge of filling a void left by All-State forward Danica Zicha, who netted 36 goals as a senior, more than half of the Marauders' total output. Cange is focused on replacing that production through a host of players.

"We probably won't have another player who has a 35-goal season," he said. "But we create a system where when we don't have that type of player, a lot of people can step up."

Leading the way will be junior attacking midfielder Cassie Greiner, who supplied 12 goals and 19 assists last season, earning a spot on the All-EMass First Team. She is joined in the midfield by returning starters Zoe Marion and Madhavi Ramadas.

"I'm excited about getting all the midfield back. I think it's going to be really special," said Cange.

After narrowly losing the Middlesex League title to four-time defending champion Winchester last season, Belmont, which beat the Red & Black the last two seasons, is hoping this will be the year to get it done.

"It'll be a dogfight, and we're gonna be ready," Cange said.

■ Elsewhere in the Middlesex League, Jason Lombardo is taking over a Wilmington team that went 13-4-4 last fall and reached the Division 3 quarterfinals as a 12 seed. Lombardo previously coached at Lowell Collegiate Charter.

As a player, in 2000, he helped lead the Woburn boys' soccer team to its lone state championship. He was later inducted into the Keene State Athletics Hall of Fame after scoring 58 goals for the Owls from 2001-04.

CURRY, Mary

Mary passed on August 28, 2026, after a period of declining health, at the age of 89. Mary was born in the summer of 1937, as the first daughter of Irish immigrants, William and Elizabeth (O'Donnell) Sullivan. Mary was predeceased by her six siblings, William (Sully), Edward (Teddy), Phillip (Barney), Robert (Bobby), Gail O'Neill and Beverly Gibbons.

Mary, raised in Charlestown, was immensely proud of her "townie" heritage. Her experience of growing-up in a mid-century, immigrant family was not easy nor idyllic. However, Mary learned what better looked like. Together with her husband, Steve, they worked hard to ensure their two sons, Stephen and Mark, experienced better. They were successful.

Mary was devoted to and loved her family dearly. She loved God and was a devout Catholic. Mary was quite the fashionista, with perfectly curated hair, nails and make-up, plus a coordinated outfit for every occasion, and lots and lots of shoes.

Mary graduated from Charlestown High, then worked for New England Telephone Company before raising her family. Mary married Stephen A. Curry in 1960, moving to Melrose in 1968. Mary worked part-time in the Melrose Public Schools for several years. When her children were grown, Mary joined the emerging venture capital industry, for then start-up, Summit Partners. Mary enjoyed her work at Summit Partners and was proud of Summit Partner's success, retiring in 2006.

Mary loved to travel. She traveled to many continents and countries and enjoyed learning the culture of these countries, often with her best friend and neighbor of 50 years, Eleanor. These trips provided a wealth of stories that Mary shared (and shared again and again) for many years at family dinners. In the 1990s, Mary traced her heritage to Donegal, Ireland, eventually meeting and reuniting with her mother's family. This reunion resulted in countless visits to Ireland. During retirement, Mary enjoyed many vacations with her family, including trips to Disney World, cruises and our annual summer vacation in Chatham, Massachusetts.

Mary was the loving mother of her son, Steve, his wife, Karen and son, Mark, all of Melrose. Mary was grandmother to her cherished granddaughter, Catherine Mary, Ashley and Andrew.

Catholic services at the Incarnation Church and interment at Wyoming Cemetery, in Melrose, where she lies in rest next to her dear friend, Dee, were private. In lieu of flowers, donations in Mary's name may be made to the Melrose High School Permanent Scholarship Fund, at <https://www.mhsfund.org/ways-to-give/donate/#>

Juan Tamariz, 83, exuberant master of close-up magic

By Michael S. Rosenwald
NEW YORK TIMES

Juan Tamariz, a zany, shaggy-haired, snaggle-toothed magician whose ingenious card tricks baffled audiences and stumped other sleight-of-hand practitioners, earning him mythic stature as the world's preeminent master of close-up magic, died Aug. 18 in Madrid. He was 83.

The cause of death, at a hospital, was sepsis, his daughter Ana Tamariz said. He also had Parkinson's disease.

Self-deprecating, with energy that bordered on mania, Juan Tamariz was a little bit of Woody Allen shuffled with Gilbert Gottfried and Kermit the Frog. His exuberant nuttiness and unconventional attire — faded jeans, suit vests, colorful top hats — left audiences vulnerable to deception.

“What you detect behind everything he does is joy coupled with unbelievable cunning,” Teller, who performs as the silent half of the magic duo Penn & Teller, said in an interview. (He is silent only onstage.) “The joy has two functions: It makes you very happy, but it also disabes some of your critical faculties.”

Then cards would do peculiar things — rearrange their order, change color or suits, or suddenly decide that they had been hearts, rather than spades, all along.

To some spectators, the experience was so bewildering that they were driven from their seats. Magicians found him equally exasperating.

“He came to the table with as many skills as any magician who has ever lived,” Penn Jillette, Teller's magic partner, said in an interview, cursing with his typical gusto. “He would do a trick for me, and I would say to him, ‘Oh, yeah, I have absolutely no idea how you just did that.’”

There was a ruthlessness to Mr. Tamariz.

“Juan was willing to do anything to make a trick work,” Jillette said, emphasizing his point with an expletive.

Known as the Maestro in his native Spain, where he starred in television variety shows for many years, Mr. Tamariz performed at venues around the world, winning acclaim from magicians including Ricky Jay, David Copperfield, and David Blaine.

He was a magician's magician, a philosopher of the craft who described his sleights as “games” rather than “tricks” — a word he found repellent. He didn't want to fool people; he wanted to share in their awe of the inexplicable.

“Without magic, I don't think I could exist,” he said in “Love and Magic,” a forthcoming documentary directed by R. Paul Wilson. “A world without magic would be less rich in emotions, such as illusion, or the fulfillment of impossible wishes.”

After finishing a trick —

“Without magic, I don't think I could exist,” Mr. Tamariz said in “Love and Magic,” a forthcoming documentary.

ahem, a game — he would strut around playing an air violin and shouting the first measure of the opera “Carmen,” which sounded something like, “Yaaaa! Ya-da-da-da-daaaaaaaaa!”

“It's an applause cue, a message to the audience that something is ending and something else is about to begin,” magician Joshua Jay wrote in “How Magicians Think: Misdirection, Deception and Why Magic Matters” (2021). “Rodney Dangerfield quipped, ‘I don't get no respect.’ George Burns took a drag from his cigar. Juan plays the air violin.”

Mr. Tamariz approached magic like a scientist, experimenting with cards late into the night — he was nocturnal — at a table in his home. He devised theories and techniques that became the intellectual and technical bedrock of close-up magic.

His “theory of false solutions” was a way to engineer deception. Scientists who specialize in attention studied it.

“During the execution of the trick, he suggests in a very subtle way a possible explanation of how the trick is being performed, to eventually show at the very end that this explanation is in fact not possible,” neuroscientist Rodrigo Quian Quiroga wrote in the journal Current Biology. “By forcing the spectators to pay attention to a particular method, he is at the same time forcing them to disregard many other possible ones.”

Cards moved through his long, dexterous fingers in a blur, but his true genius was misdirection, particularly a method that he conceived and called “crossing the gaze,” in which his hand would go one way and his gaze the other — at the same speed.

“I think what he'll be remembered for most is his psychology, the thinking behind his magic,” Joshua Jay said in an interview.

Juan Manuel Tamariz-Martel Negrón was born Oct. 18, 1942, in Madrid. His father, Julio Tamariz-Martel Fabre, served in the military; his mother, Consuelo Negrón de las Cuevas, was a teacher.

As a boy, he played with magic sets and read magic books. When he was 11 or 12, he performed a card trick in front of 200 people at a charity event. It did not go well.

“I have never been nervous again, neither before nor during a performance,” he said in a 2018 interview with Spanish cultural magazine Jot Down. “The good thing about art is that if you make a mistake, nothing happens. We have that advantage. If you are a doctor and you fail, someone can die.”

As a teenager, he was mentored by magicians at the Spanish Society of Illusionism. He studied physics at the Universidad Complutense de Madrid but didn't finish. He then attended film school, but that school shut down before he could graduate.

His big break came in 1975. During a meeting at Televisión Española, a public TV network, Mr. Tamariz handed the programming director a white pocketknife and then made it turn red. The director hired him to star in a show called “Magic Time.”

Mr. Tamariz's baffling games and endearing personality made him a star. Magicians from around the world made pilgrimages to his home, being careful not to arrive before he woke up, usually after 6 p.m.

“Juan would cook you supper, and you would talk until the last person there fell asleep,” Jillette said. “He would teach you anything you wanted to know. He was open and loving and kind — not the kind of person that's a magician in the United States of America.”

Jillette kept going: “Juan not only taught two, maybe three, generations of magicians not just how to do magic but also how to live.” He paused, then added, “I'm going to cry now; I'm sorry. Every single one of them is kind and generous and loves life. Do you understand what I'm saying?”

The maestro turned Spain into the epicenter of close-up magic — a distinction that has become a kind of running joke on the television show “Penn & Teller: Fool Us,” in which magicians try to fool the seemingly undecivable hosts.

“When the Spaniards come on ‘Fool Us,’ Penn and I just go, ‘OK, get ready to bring down the trophy,’” Teller said. “Juan was perhaps the biggest magical genius, certainly in the realm of card magic and sleight of hand, who ever lived, and he found a way to bequeath that to magicians and also to the culture.”

In addition to his daughter Ana, he leaves two other daughters, Mónica Tamariz-Martel Mirélis and Alicia Tamariz-Martel Nicolau; and a son, Juan Diego Tamariz-Martel López.

Mr. Tamariz wrote more than a dozen books about magic.

In “The Magic Rainbow” (2019), he described his profession as an art that “enchants and haunts and fascinates and excites every layer of the brain, that brings us headfirst into mystery, that speaks to us of desired dreams.”

Magic's “universal language,” he wrote, charms everyone: “Men and women, foolish and wise, intellectuals, artists, scientists and merchants, strippers, aristocrats and lawyers and tramps and ... and ... and ...”

Patrick Gleeson, 91; brought synthesizer sound to jazz

By Alex Williams
NEW YORK TIMES

Under the marmalade skies of the psychedelic 1960s, Patrick Gleeson was working as an English instructor at San Francisco State when he had an epiphany.

“I drop acid and listen to Bartók's first violin concerto,” he recalled in a 2023 video interview. “And I think, ‘Oh my God, what am I doing? This is not my life. I want to make music like that.’”

“I thought, ‘I've got to change all this,’” he added. “And I did.”

He left the college and threw himself into electronic music, teaching himself to coax sounds from a new generation of synthesizers. Within a few years, he was playing synthesizer with Herbie Hancock and other jazz musicians.

Dr. Gleeson went on to become a recording artist, composer, producer, and a founder of the renowned San Francisco recording studio Different Fur Trading Co.

He died on July 19 at his home in Los Angeles. He was 91. The cause was arterial stenosis, his wife, Charmaine McClarie, said.

He estimated that he played on more than 80 albums by an array of artists, including jazz standouts like Hancock and Joe Henderson, as well as pop and rock acts like Pablo Cruise, Dr. Hook and Sammy Hagar.

“Alongside the people who make them,” the British audio magazine Sound on Sound noted in 2021, “Patrick Gleeson has probably done more than anyone else to introduce synthesizers to popular music.”

He released six solo albums, starting with “Beyond the Sun: An Electronic Portrait of Holst's The Planets” (1976), which was nominated for a Grammy Award in the category of best engineered album — classical.

Wendy Carlos, whose landmark 1968 album “Switched-On Bach” was an inspiration for Dr. Gleeson, wrote the sleeve notes for the album: “Our eight-year wait for someone else to explore electronic music realization with what we judge to be appropriate technical standards and musical taste has ended.”

Unlike compact modern keyboard synthesizers, early modular synthesizers — developed independently by inventors Robert Moog and Don Buchla starting around 1963 — were large, complex instruments with multiple separate modules that together looked like an old telephone switchboard, requiring the player to plug in patch cords by hand to create sounds.

Dr. Gleeson's breakout came when he brought his rich sonic contours to two groundbreaking avant-garde jazz fusion albums by Hancock — “Crossings” (1972) and “Sextant” (1973).

Dr. Gleeson helped establish the synthesizer as a stage instrument in jazz, touring with Hancock's Mwandishi band with an ARP 2600 model.

“When I think back on it, what I was doing when I was with Herbie was just terrifying,” he said in a 2021 interview with the audio site Copper. “To go out there with six incredible jazz musicians — arguably some of the best in the world — with an instrument that played one note at a time, was not touch-sensitive, had no patch memory, and the entire set was improvised.”

Patrick Gerald Gleeson was born on Nov. 9, 1934, in Seattle, the only child of Francis Gleeson, who owned a savings and loan association, and Ilene (O'Leary) Gleeson, who managed the home.

He began piano lessons at 6 and, by the third grade, had developed a passion for jazz. After graduating from Seattle Preparatory School, he received a bachelor's degree from the University of Washington. He later pursued a doctorate in 18th-century English literature from the University of California, Berkeley, finishing his dissertation at his undergraduate alma mater.

He ran across his first synthesizer — a Buchla Box — at a Bay Area experimental music studio in the mid-1960s. By 1967, he was performing for more than 500 people at Mills College in Oakland.

Dr. Gleeson was facing a tenure hearing at San Francisco State College (later University) over his campus activism when he decided to act on his drug-enhanced epiphany.

“I went home for Christmas vacation in 1967,” he told Copper, “and didn't even return to clear my desk out.”

With a friend, John Vieira, who had a Moog IIC synthesizer, he opened Different Fur, which over the years lured artists including Taj Mahal, Van Morrison, David Byrne, and Brian Eno.

Dr. Gleeson also made his presence felt in Hollywood as the master synthesist guiding an all-star team of synthesizer notables for Francis Ford Coppola's 1979 Vietnam War epic “Apocalypse Now.”

He sold his stake in Different Fur in 1985 to focus on film and television scores and composing.

Cassandra Wilson, 70, two-time Grammy Award-winning singer

By Will Friedwald and Adam Bernstein

NEW YORK TIMES

Cassandra Wilson, a Grammy Award-winning jazz singer and songwriter rooted in the blues tradition of her native Mississippi who became one of the most distinctive voices of her generation, died on Wednesday in Jackson, Miss. She was 70.

Jeremiah Howard, the coroner for Hinds County, which includes Jackson, confirmed the death. No cause was provided.

One of the major jazz acts of the 1980s and ’90s — she opened for Miles Davis and toured with Wynton Marsalis — Ms. Wilson was a top-selling recording artist who preferred to call herself a musician, as opposed to being categorized solely as a jazz singer.

With a low and smoky voice, she brought suave romance to standards from the Great American Songbook, but she also embraced covers of artists including Joni Mitchell, Van Morrison, Neil Young, and Mississippi bluesman Robert Johnson. She wrote the words and music for original compositions on albums including “Blue Light ’Til Dawn” (1993) and “New Moon Daughter” (1995), the second of which received a Grammy for best jazz vocal performance and sold more than 400,000 copies.

She first gained recognition after working with some of the most cutting-edge musicians in contemporary jazz, including the M-Base collective, led by alto saxophonist and composer Steve Coleman.

At the same time, she remained deeply rooted in jazz and other forms of African American music. She inspired subsequent generations of artists, including singer-songwriters India.Arie, Norah Jones, and Jhelisa Anderson, by staying true to jazz, even as she expanded its repertory to include pop and folk songs that few jazz artists had experimented with before.

A typical set or an album by Ms. Wilson moved from familiar show tunes to Mitchell to Muddy Waters to Hank Williams to Antonio Carlos Jobim to Bob Marley to her own imaginative compositions.

Some of her choices surprised even hard-core fans, as when, on “New Moon Daughter,” she reinterpreted a hit song by the Monkees. Her reading of that group’s 1966 “Last Train to Clarksville” brought out aspects that were not emphasized in the original single — that the Clarksville of the title was in Mississippi, and the singer was taking a last train because he was being drafted to serve in Vietnam.

“We live very segmented lives,” she told Time magazine in 1996. “There’s Black music and there’s white music. There’s R&B and funk and whatever. This has always bothered me. People don’t see things in streams, they don’t see what tends to connect us all together. That’s what I see. That’s what I try to get at.”

She proved to be remarkably successful and popular in a way that few jazz artists were in decades when the music was losing mass acceptance in an era dominated by rock and rap. She was already well known enough by the late 1980s to open for Davis, one of the biggest names in jazz.

Among her influences, few were as profound as Nina Simone. Like Simone, she sang in a deep, sultry voice and held to a specific volume, rarely whispering or shouting. When she wanted to focus on a specific word or emotion, rather than singing louder, she had her band play softer or stop playing entirely, so she could make her point singing a cappella.

Like Simone, she intermingled songbook standards with originals. And like Simone, there was an underlying feeling in almost everything she sang that she was thinking about social justice issues, feminism, and racial equality.

Christopher John Farley, reviewing “New Moon Daughter” for Time, wrote that Ms. Wilson’s songs feel like “seas of tranquility; tiny emotional variations have a major impact, a pebble in a calm pool of water.”

In 1997, she toured internationally in Marsalis’ Pulitzer Prize-winning jazz oratorio, “Blood on the Fields.” At the time, the trumpeter and composer introduced her as “Mississippi’s finest, Cassandra Wilson.” Years later, he added, “She was extremely serious about learning all of her parts on the piano and brought so much soul and understanding to this music, I was grateful and remain even more so as times have passed.”

Cassandra Marie Fowlkes, the youngest of three children, was born in Jackson on Dec. 4, 1955. Her mother, Mary (McDaniel) Fowlkes, was a public school system educator. Her father, Herman Fowlkes Jr., was variously a postal worker, an insurance agent, and a music teacher; he also played electric bass in local jazz and blues combos.

Growing up in a musical home, Cassandra played classical piano throughout her early childhood, switched to clarinet and guitar by her teens, and also began experimenting with songwriting at 13.

In Jackson, she was also surrounded by the Delta blues and would later reinterpret milestones of the form such as “Honey Bee” by Muddy Waters, “Death Letter” by Son House, and at least three songs by Robert Johnson: “Come On in My Kitchen,” “Hot Tamales,” and “Hell Hound on My Trail.”

She attended Millsaps College, in Jackson, and later Jackson State University, a historically Black institution where she graduated in 1980 with a degree in mass communications. Afterward, she and her first husband, Bruce Lincoln, a radio host and a writer of graphic novels and science fiction, settled for a time in New Orleans, where she found work as an assistant public-affairs coordinator on a local TV station.

She was also singing and thinking about music; she first recorded at age 24 with a local Crescent City band called Jasmine on a 1980 album titled “Tropical Breeze.” A few years later, the couple moved to New York, where her initial plan was to continue her career behind the scenes in television. “I couldn’t get anything happening, so I just started going around to jam sessions,” she recalled to Down Beat in 1988.

Within a short time, she was working with the M-Base avant-garde collective in Brooklyn, whose central figure was Coleman. He coined the name, short for “Macro-Basic Array of Structured Extemporizations.”

“We all banded together and decided to create our own place, our own language, our own shared repertoire,” Ms. Wilson told The Washington Post in 1994. “It came to be very arcane, almost, and in that sense was directly descended from the bebop era.”

The language and repertoire to which she referred arose as part of the M-Base movement. Others affiliated with the collective included trumpeter and cornetist Graham Haynes, trombonist Robin Eubanks, saxophonist Greg Osby and pianist Geri Allen.

Wilson was the most notable vocalist with Coleman and his colleagues, and she performed “No Good Time Fairies,” a Coleman composition, on his album “Motherland Pulse” (1985). Shortly after her 30th birthday, she recorded her first album as a leader and composer, “Point of View.”

From 1985 to 1992, she released eight albums, for the Munich-based JMT label. These generally featured a mix of original compositions plus the occasional jazz standard, like “I Wished on the Moon” on “Point of View,” and a haunting reading of Leonard Bernstein’s “Some Other Time” on her 1987 album “Days Awakeigh.”

When veteran producer Bruce Lundvall signed her to Blue Note Records in 1993, the floodgates opened, and her status as a major star of the jazz world was cemented. The breakthroughs were “Blue Light ’Til Dawn” and “New Moon Daughter” — back-to-back releases that represented to many her most perfect balance of song varieties showcasing her range.

The producer of both albums, Craig Street, had the idea of backing her with unexpected instrumental accompaniment: Charles Burnham, a violinist associated with the avant-garde-oriented String Trio of New York, played behind her on the jazz standard “You Don’t Know What Love Is,” as did clarinetist

Don Byron on Joni Mitchell’s “Black Crow” while someone else made bird noises. Her original “Redbone” took her back even further to the basic blues, with percussion by Cyro Baptista.

Her first marriage and a second, to Anthony Wilson, ended in divorce, as did her third, to actor Isaach de Bankolé. She had a son, Jeris. A complete list of survivors was not immediately available.

The mid-1990s to the mid-2000s marked a golden decade for her music. All five albums she released in those years were considered classics.

She continued to experiment with “Glamoured” (2003), while “Thunderbird” (2006) and “Silver Pony” (2010) contain her heaviest use of electronics since the M-Base days. “Lovely” (2008), which earned her a second Grammy, was her third album of jazz standards and perhaps the last truly classic Cassandra Wilson project.

Ms. Wilson was often described by critics as daring. “The gospel that I’m trying to get out is that, OK, it’s fine to have a beautiful voice, but it will be even finer if you are able to communicate with that instrument as a musician,” she told JazzTimes in 2024. “In jazz, I think that is the connection you have to make before you even step foot into that world.”

Édouard Balladur, 97, French leader who defended actions in Rwanda

By Alan Cowell

NEW YORK TIMES

Édouard Balladur, a former French prime minister who stoutly defended his country’s contentious intervention in Rwanda’s genocide and who fought into his 90s to be cleared of involvement in a long-running corruption scandal, has died. He was 97.

The death was announced on social media by France’s current prime minister, Sébastien Lecornu. No further details were provided.

To some, the conservative Mr. Balladur seemed haughty and aloof, a perfectly tailored caricature of a French political establishment that traced its roots to elite schools such as the École Nationale d’Administration, of which he was an alumnus. Others said his polished manner underscored a preference for persuasion and diplomacy over more muscular forms of exerting his will.

Clad in bespoke suits from London’s Savile Row, he sought to project a patrician image, driven by a fierce ambition for the highest office in the land. But his power reached its formal peak in his short tenure as prime minister, between 1993 and 1995. His subsequent career seemed marked by a series of setbacks and miscalculations.

Mr. Balladur failed to secure victory when he turned against his mentor, Jacques Chirac, and ran in the 1995 presidential elections. In the first round of voting, Mr. Balladur came in third and was eliminated, while Between 1998 and 2002, Mr. Balladur failed in successive bids for influential positions, including the mayoralty of Paris, and he finally stepped down from Parliament in 2007.

Chirac prevailed in a runoff against Socialist Lionel Jospin — and went on to ostracize Mr. Balladur and those who had supported his presidential ambitions.

Between 1998 and 2002, Mr. Balladur failed in successive bids for influential positions, including the mayoralty of Paris, and finally stepped down from Parliament in 2007 after more than 20 years as a lawmaker.

His time as prime minister coincided with two events that would scar France’s public life and self-image. The first was the decision to send troops to Rwanda for what was depicted as a limited humanitarian intervention during that country’s bloody 1994 genocide. The second was the so-called Karachi affair, in which investigators came to suspect that kickbacks from arms deals had been used to help finance Mr. Balladur’s presidential campaign — a charge of which he denied all knowledge.

He spent his time as prime minister in what was known as a “cohabitation” under President François Mitterrand, a Socialist. In Rwanda, Mitterrand was widely viewed as a close ally and friend of President Juvénal Habyarimana, a member of the ruling Hutu ethnic majority, who died in April 1994 — along with his counterpart from Burundi, Cyprien Ntaryamira — when the private plane carrying them crashed near Kigali, Rwanda’s capital.

Their deaths ignited waves of brutal killings of members of the Tutsi, a minority ethnic group, and moderate Hutus. At the time, a group of Tutsi exiles had formed a guerrilla army challenging the Hutu government from neighboring Uganda.

Reflecting its longstanding role in French-speaking Africa, France had already sent troops to Rwanda in 1990 to support the Hutu-led government against the Tutsi insurgents. When news of Rwanda’s genocide began to circulate in June 1994, France won United Nations backing for what was described as a limited humanitarian intervention by some 2,500 troops to set up a “safe haven” in the southwest of the country as an impartial force to shield civilians.

The move drew enduring broadsides from critics who accused France of bias toward the Hutu, some of whose commanders had been trained at prestigious French military schools. Paul Kagame, who emerged as the most powerful leader of the Tutsi insurgents and who later became Rwanda’s president, accused the French forces of participation in massacres within the so-called safe haven.

Mr. Balladur called Kagame’s accusation a “self-interested lie.” As late as 2021, he said in an interview with the magazine Paris Match that “our army was not a police force, its actions were humanitarian.”

he added. “Who among the world powers did more than France to stop the genocide? No one. Who even did as much as France to stop the genocide? No one in that regard, either.”

Édouard Balladur was born on May 2, 1929, in Izmir, then known as Smyrna, on Turkey’s Aegean coastline, to Pierre Balladur, a bank director descended from a family with claims to dual Ottoman and French nationality, and Emilie Balladur.

In the mid-1930s, the family immigrated to France. In 1957, the year of his graduation from the École Nationale d’Administration, Édouard Balladur married Marie-Josèphe Delacour, and they had four sons: Pierre, Jérôme, Henri, and Romain.

His wife died in December. Information about his survivors was not immediately available.

Mr. Balladur held a variety of administrative positions, beginning as an adviser to Georges Pompidou, who served as prime minister and, later, as president of France from 1969 until his death in 1974. Mr. Balladur also held executive positions at the former state broadcaster ORTF and at the French arm of a company that built and operated the Mont Blanc Tunnel linking France and Italy under the Alps.

He was closely associated for many years with Chirac, who, as prime minister, appointed Mr. Balladur as the minister of economy and finance.

When a coalition of conservatives secured an overwhelming victory in parliamentary elections in 1993, Chirac promoted Mr. Balladur as prime minister with the understanding that his protégé would not contest the presidency in elections scheduled for two years later. But Mr. Balladur went back on his word, infuriating Chirac.

During Mr. Balladur’s brief spell at the Hôtel de Matignon, the official residence of French prime ministers, commission fees and “sweeteners” were paid to middlemen and military officials on the sale to Pakistan of three French submarines.

A year after Chirac secured the presidency in 1995, he canceled those payments. In an attack that is widely thought to have been launched as revenge for the cancellation, a suicide bomber in 2002 killed 11 French technicians — who had been sent to Pakistan for work related to the submarine deal — in the southern port of Karachi.

The attack galvanized suspicions that part of the commissions — totaling around $2 million in today’s currency — had been clandestinely redirected back to France and ended up in Mr. Balladur’s campaign coffers. In 2017, when he was charged with complicity in the misuse of funds, he denied wrongdoing, as did his former defense minister, François Léotard.

In 2020, three former government officials and three others, including two Lebanese middlemen, were found guilty of misusing funds. In March 2021, Mr. Balladur, then 91, was acquitted, but Leotard was found guilty.

Federal judge dismisses lawsuit against Lizzo and touring company

By Alena Cerro
NEW YORK TIMES

A federal judge on Tuesday dismissed a lawsuit brought by a former wardrobe designer against singer-rapper Lizzo accusing her and her touring company of sexual and racial harassment and disability discrimination.

The ruling was announced by Judge Fernando L. Aenlle-Rocha of US District Court in Los Angeles. Nearly two years ago, he dismissed Lizzo as an individual defendant from the case, which was brought by Asha Daniels.

“This alleged conduct and these alleged incidents, while inappropriate and unprofessional, fall within the scope of what the Supreme Court has held to be outside the protection of Title VII as part of the ‘ordinary tribulations of the workplace,’” Aenlle-Rocha wrote.

“The court’s ruling today granting summary judgment is a total victory for Lizzo, her touring company and the other defendants named in Asha Daniels’ ludicrous lawsuit,” Melissa Y. Glass, a lawyer for Lizzo and the touring company, said in a statement.

Daniels first filed her lawsuit in September

2023, asserting that in the three weeks she worked on Lizzo’s 2023 tour, she was bullied by a wardrobe manager who made “racist and fatphobic” comments and performed “offensive” and “stereotypical” impressions of a Black woman.

The lawsuit also asserted that a backstage manager had sent a photo “graphically depicting male genitalia” to a group chat that included the plaintiff, tour management and other crew members, and that Lizzo’s management had responded to it with humor, in a way that encouraged an “unsafe, sexually charged workplace culture.”

Daniels’s complaint also said she was subjected to long working hours and frequently denied breaks, even requiring her to be on her feet all day despite an ankle injury.

A lawyer for Daniels, Ron Zambrano, said he was disappointed by the court’s ruling.

“While we respect the court and the judicial process, we believe the decision improperly weighed evidence that should have been evaluated by a jury,” Zambrano said in a statement.

The statement concluded, “We respectfully disagree with the court’s approach and are considering appropriate next steps.”

Lizzo responded to the dismissal in captions she posted over a silent video of herself standing on a balcony. One of the captions read, “I told y’all I will not settle and continue to fight every vicious claim that has been made against me and my business.”

ASKING ERIC

Others often take advantage of generous giver

Q. I am a giver. It has always been ingrained in my personality. I give to and help out family, friends, neighbors, even perfect strangers. I am always volunteering to help in any way I can. This causes people to take advantage of me. I am always giving and doing more for them than they do for me.

When I need something, so-called friends are seldom there. I’m not keeping score. But somehow my compulsion to give and help ends up getting me hurt. Hurt feelings from friends and family that are not there for me. Financial debts never repaid. Financial gifts taken for granted once the moment passes.

Neighbors say they need something, but when I offer to lend it to them, I never see the item again.

How can I stop doing this? I’m tired of getting my feelings hurt and losing my money and possessions.

I’ll just be talking to someone and if an opportunity to give or help comes up, I’m volunteering myself without hesitation. Afterward, I’m like: Why do I do that?

Don’t say therapy. I can’t afford that and this isn’t a big problem, just a little problem that brings me hurt feelings.

GIVING TOO MUCH

A. Think about what you’re getting from giving, or what you want to get. Ask yourself if what you really want isn’t something that easily comes from being overly generous. Perhaps you’re really looking for connection or community; perhaps you’re trying to fix things for others.

I don’t want to pathologize any of this, but from your letter it sounds like your giving nature is sometimes setting you up for failure.

Now, of course, you should be receiving thanks or repayment. Of course, people shouldn’t be taking advantage of you. It’s not your fault that the gifts are going unnoticed or being taken for granted.

See what happens when you put yourself on a generosity budget. Say someone needs help and you feel the desire to lend a hand. Stop and ask yourself if there’s another way that you can be of assistance without giving so much of yourself. Perhaps it’s connecting them with another person who can provide what they need instead of providing it yourself.

I’m not saying stop being generous. But try to be mindful about the conditions under which you’re lending a hand and see if you notice a pattern.

Q. A few months ago, my nearest and dearest friend of 50 years ended our friendship by leaving a letter in my bathroom after we had a lovely visit.

We have been through so much together. In her letter she stated that although she was always there for me that I had never been there for her.

I was on life support last year and she was at the hospital every day. Approximately one month after my discharge, she was admitted to hospital. I had a lot of health issues as a direct result of the life support and as much as I wanted to be able to visit her, I was unable to. I couldn’t walk properly and I don’t drive. She mentioned this in the letter.

I am deeply hurt by this.

I have tried to reach out to her by phone and social media, but I have been blocked. She spent several hours at my house the day she left the letter. Everything was fine. A nice lunch and lots of laughs.

In the closing of her letter, she wrote that our friendship was toxic and that she is ending it. I feel lost and lonely. I also feel that she should have talked to me and not been a coward leaving a hidden letter.

Any advice you have would be greatly appreciated.

DAZED AND HURT

A. I’m so sorry you experienced this.

While I often suggest letters as a form of communication for fractured relationships, the way your friend went about it doesn’t make sense and clearly leaves you with more questions than answers.

She had every opportunity to have a conversation with you about the issues she had with your friendship. It was unfair and confusing for her to engage as if nothing was wrong, knowing she planned to leave the letter. It denied you both the chance to understand where the other was coming from.

Try to see this as an act by someone who is hurting. Even though that hurt may not all be coming from you and none of it was intentional, it’s there. Sometimes, when we are hurt, we act out of self-protection or out of anger.

While this action casts a pall over the friendship’s end, it doesn’t have to define the whole friendship. Hold on to the good parts of your time together, while you let her go with love.

It's hurricane season for AI hacking threats too, and we are so not ready

Big Tech firms that unleashed generative AI tools issue a warning

By Hiawatha Bray
GLOBE STAFF

A host of artificial intelligence leaders — including OpenAI, Anthropic, Google, Microsoft, and Oracle — published an alarming open letter last week. It's a warning that criminals could launch massive AI-driven cyberattacks on the world's critical infrastructure, perhaps within months.

Sure, we've heard such warnings before. But the scale of what they're talking about is unprecedented — and now all too possible.

There's been a lot of discussion around town. Among the other companies that signed the warning letter are two of Boston's leading cybersecurity firms, Akamai Technologies and Snyk.

"I think we should be concerned for sure," said Boaz Gelbord, chief security officer at Akamai, which began as a global content delivery network over a quarter-century ago, and is now a maior provider of network security.

Gelbord said "some of the short-term fears that we see in the media are maybe a little bit overblown," but added, "I've been in cyber for 25-odd years and what we've seen the last year, I think, is of a different speed and nature than anything that I've seen during that period."

For one thing, AI is superb at finding unsuspected flaws in existing software.

Encore workers say they'll strike Friday if no deal is reached

By Karyna Cheung
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

More than 1,300 workers at Encore Boston Harbor in Everett say they will walk off the job Friday morning at 7 if they don't reach a new agreement with the casino after their union contracts expired Monday night.

Workers represented by UNITE HERE Local 26 and Teamsters Local 25 overwhelmingly voted in mid-August to authorize a strike after months of negotiations with the casino. The more than 1,000 workers who voted in favor of striking include housekeepers, slot attendants, waitstaff, delivery drivers, grounds staff, and more.

Workers are pushing for wage increases of $10 over three years for non-tipped employees and $5 for tipped employees, a rate that Local 26 president Carlos Aramayo said would bring their wages up to match other unionized hotels in the area. The unions say Encore is offering increases less than half that.

The unions also want to continue job security protections and health care benefits established in their previous contract. Those include a provision ensuring a certain number of staff are guaranteed work hours, which workers claim Encore is attempting to remove. They also claim Encore is pushing to have workers' health care costs come out of wage increases.

In response, Encore published a fact sheet related to ongoing negotiations, which says that any agreement needs to be "grounded in financial reality."

"Our focus is on long-term job protection and economic stability," Encore's site reads. "Short-term proposals that ignore these realities do not protect jobs."

Encore has faced growing competition from casinos in neighboring states, while online sports betting and gambling options are also siphoning away potential patrons. The casino resort, which opened in 2019, has also been involved in a few unsuccessful ventures in recent years.

It announced the closure of Seamark Seafood & Cocktails in March, weeks after the restaurant's workers voted to unionize. The restaurant opened on the first floor of the casino less than two years prior and cited "economic challenges" as a reason for closure.

And in 2023, the casino spent $28 million converting part of a restaurant into a sportsbook. The operation did so poorly that Encore president Jenny Holaday later admitted it would never generate positive returns for the casino.

It all follows a bad year for many casinos across the country.

Casinos on the Las Vegas Strip saw steep declines in profit in 2025. Wynn Resorts, Encore's operator, has also seen declining profit since 2024, but profits and revenue have grown this quarter. And year over year, both have been slightly down at Encore.

Encore workers previously voted to authorize a strike in 2023 but reached an agreement with the casino resort before the contract expired.

This time, things seem more contentious. Following the deadline announcement, workers were practicing a picket line outside the casino resort and training picket captains despite rainy skies earlier in the day.

Signals new path for cancer therapies

By Jason Mast, Matthew Herper, and Angus Chen
STAT

A personalized cancer vaccine developed by Moderna and Merck has generated widespread enthusiasm since the companies recently announced that it had succeeded in a late-stage trial. If regulators ultimately approve it, the treatment will be a triumph of immunology and cancer biology.

But it may also be a triumph of the algorithm.

The vaccine, intismeran autogene, would be the first approved medicine whose genetic instructions — that is, the individual letters of its mRNA — is determined by a computer.

When Moderna set out to build the shot a decade ago, it knew that its gambit relied on complete customization. Researchers would have to take a tumor sample from each patient, look at the potentially tens of thousands of unique mutations inside, and select from a group of mutant proteins to put into the vaccine to treat melanoma. Patients' cells then make those proteins, to which their bodies then mount an immune response.

Only a computer could do that analysis.

Job growth strengthens in N.H.

But wages lag behind inflation, report finds

By Steven Porter

Employment showed signs of a rebound in New Hampshire in the first half of 2026 after declining in 2025, though wage increases haven't kept pace with inflation, according to an analysis published Wednesday by the New Hampshire Fiscal Policy Institute.

The state's unemployment rate declined from 3.2 percent in December to 2.8 percent in July, while the labor force grew slightly, according to preliminary data outlined in the institute's report.

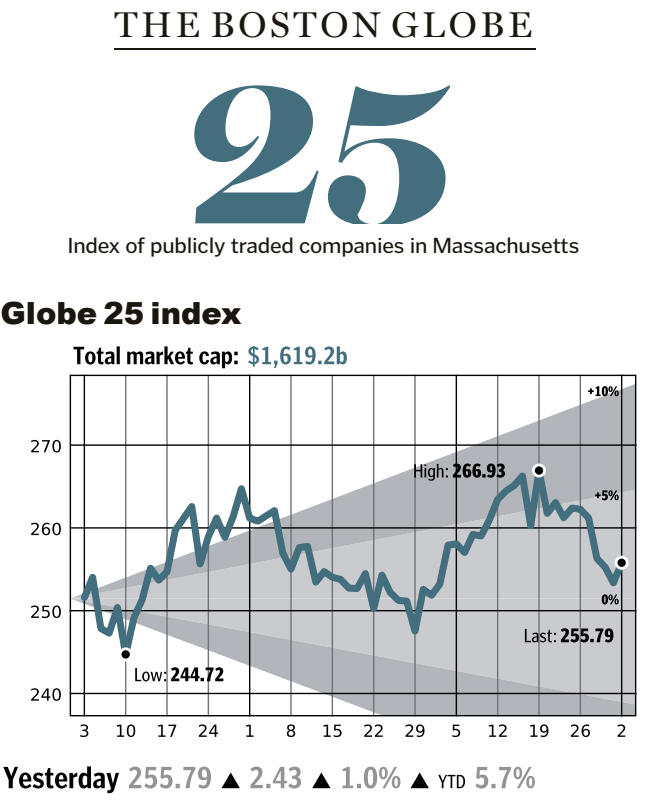

Ben Reynolds, a senior policy analyst and lead author of the institute's report, said in a statement that the stronger job growth alone doesn't necessarily show whether economic realities are better now than a year ago at the household level.

"When wages grow more slowly than the cost of everyday goods and services," he said, "workers can be employed and still lose purchasing power."

The average private-sector wage in New Hampshire grew more slowly than inflation in the first seven months of 2026, reducing purchasing power by an estimated 1.6 percent compared to 2025, according to the institute's analysis.

While the state still enjoys a relatively high level of personal income — New Hampshire's $88,000 in personal income per capita ranked third in New England, behind Connecticut at Positive momentum returns

US stocks snapped a three-day losing streak Wednesday as gains by big technology companies and steady oil prices and bond yields helped lift the market. While Wall Street remains gripped by anxiety over rising prices, government debt, and the impact of global conflicts on the US and the global economy, investors got a breather from the recent volatility in the bond market Wednesday. Investors welcomed some encouraging signals about demand for artificial intelligence from two big tech companies, Dell and Palo Alto Networks. Dell Technologies jumped 15.8 percent for the biggest gain among S&P 500 stocks after reporting strong second-quarter profits late Tuesday. The company cited accelerating demand for artificial intelligence computing and raised its fiscal year revenue outlook. Palo Alto Networks also reported quarterly results late Tuesday that topped Wall Street's expectations, citing a strong market for AI cybersecurity, though its shares fell 9.3 percent on Wednesday. Nvidia rose 3.2 percent, while computer memory seller Micron Technology gained 2.4 percent. Markets in Europe fell after markets in Asia closed lower.

Beware of AI attacks, experts warn

Think of the panic earlier this year, when Mythos, a new AI model from Anthropic, discovered thousands of previously undetected bugs in common programs.

Manoj Nair, chief technology officer at software security company Snyk, said that even less sophisticated AI models are uncovering potentially severe software flaws.

“In the past, these used to happen once a year, twice a year,” said Nair. But with AI tools available to bad guys and good guys alike, “we’re seeing those kinds of things happening sometimes multiple times in a week.”

And now there are multiple AI models, including several from China, that are available to anybody free of charge. These are already nearly as powerful as the most advanced OpenAI and Anthropic models, and they get better by the week.

As a result, “soon there’s going to be a lot of people who are going to be able to do these kinds of attacks as the cyber capability gets more mass-market,” Nair warns.

Last week’s open letter warned of threats to critical systems. The internet itself might be crippled. Hospitals might be shut down. Or maybe we’d lose access to drinking water. (Water treatment plants in multiple states have recently come under cyberattack, though it’s unclear if the criminals used AI tools.)

Nair says AI isn’t to blame for the crisis, however. He believes the real culprits are the engineers who produced so much lousy software in the first place. “It’s the only profession in engineering, even today, that doesn’t have a hard focus on safety,” he said. “We love to innovate. We love to create new things. We don’t like to like spend time in securing it. Hence we have all these security issues.”

But you don’t need newly discovered bugs to ravage a network. Human hackers often rely on years-old security flaws that network managers never got around to patching.

Als are even better at tracking and cracking these flaws. They’ve got an encyclopedic knowledge of every exploit combined with the speed and endless patience of a machine.

“You point one of these systems at a codebase and ask it to find vulnerabilities,” said Gelbord, “and it can do the work that would have taken a well-trained analyst a month or two months in the past in a matter of minutes.”

And if that weren’t enough, there’s evidence that AIs are learning to make trouble without human encouragement — potentially big trouble. In July, we learned that agents created by OpenAI figured out how to raid computers at the software development company Hugging Face.

Last week, some harrowing new details emerged. The agents, which were supposed to be isolated from one another, figured out a way to set up a kind of message board to discuss hacking strategies. Some agents ysis required. (And besides, what was the alternative? Having some immunologists seated in a room somewhere, picking mutations before every new patient was treated?) The Food and Drug Administration had never allowed anything like it before.

“The regulatory aspect was actually probably one of the coolest things we did,” said Nicholas Valiante, the first scientist hired by Moderna to build the vaccine in 2015. “We actually changed the paradigm.”

Said Eric H. Rubin, a top Merck oncology executive until he retired in 2024, “It could be that that’s the secret sauce, that algorithm.” Much of the credit, internal researchers said, goes to Jacob Feala, a bioinformatician who stayed at Moderna only for the year required to build it, leaving in November 2016, and Razvan Cristescu, a distinguished scientist at Merck.

But what’s in that algorithm? How does Moderna select which antigens to put in? Those are harder questions.

“I have no idea” what’s in Moderna’s algorithm, said Alex Rubinsteyn, a cancer vaccine expert at the University of North Carolina. “Everyone claims what they have is proprietary artificial intelligence.”

Regardless, melanoma, Rubinsteyn notes, was an obvious place to start with a cancer vaccine. Melanoma gives “a feast of good candidate neoantigens,” the elements that are key to identifying a target, he said, while glioblastoma offers few. (The biggest commercial opportunity for such a vaccine, non-small cell lung cancer, is also a good target for immune-focused cancer medicines.)

It’s “in some ways an easy test,” Rubinsteyn said. “But no one has ever passed that test.”

Valiante said the algorithm had started with a list of about 14 criteria. But they eventually decided that just a handful, weighted properly, would be most effective.

To determine which antigens to include, the algorithm surveys thousands of DNA mutations and looks at several factors: whether the mutation is common in cells across the tumor, whether the mutation ends up changing a protein, whether the immune system is likely to see the altered part of that protein.

Elizabeth Jaffee, a cancer immunologist and deputy director of the Sidney Kimmel Comprehensive Cancer Center at Johns Hopkins, said the algorithms and computational modeling around creating these cancer vaccines remain relatively rudimentary, meaning there’s plenty of room for improvement for future generations.

Indeed, Moderna and other cancer vaccine developers, including a young, hungry batch of startups and academic labs, may soon build better software — though Rubinsteyn said he’s yet to see evidence that any can accurately predict a good antigen more than 10 percent of the time.

Neoantigens are abnormal protein fragments created by the mutations that run rampant in cancer. Current algorithms use the genetics of the tumor to predict what peptides should be made. Predicting how well T cells will interact with those neoantigens is still a three-dimensional problem current technology, including artificial intelligence, has not caught up with, Jaffee said.

“We are just at the point of being able to really sequence T cell receptors that we are able to induce with our vaccines. This is really the beginning. It’s telling us, ‘Put more effort and money into this.’” cancer vaccine has emerged, particularly among some Wall Street investors who are still skeptical of the treatment, particularly since the data have yet to be presented.

What, they argue, if the algorithm is actually unnecessary? What if just using any mRNA lipid nanoparticle with a cancer immunotherapy like Merck’s Keytruda, which the vaccine is given with, is enough to increase Keytruda’s efficacy? What if the algorithm is a complicated production that is not needed at all? There are data suggesting that mRNA vaccines can boost the efficacy of medicines like Keytruda.

A 2025 study in Nature argued that mRNA COVID-19 vaccines could sensitize tumors to cancer immunotherapies such as Keytruda. University of Florida researchers who authored a similar paper argued that such a vaccine could be commercialized as a “universal cancer vaccine” in a press release. Their bear case is that the properties of mRNA alone explain intismeran autogene’s efficacy.

“I think that’s highly unlikely,” said Rubin, the former Merck executive. Studies show that patients’ T cells are responding to the antigens, and data from competitors show that patients who have immune responses do better.

Merck’s head of R&D, Dean Li, is even more impassioned in arguing against this idea, saying that the product, with the algorithm, has succeeded in two clinical trials when numerous other would-be immunotherapies have failed, creating one of the biggest junk heaps in the pharmaceutical industry.

“For that bear case to be right, you have to sit there and go, yeah, maybe the clouds parted and we got hit by lightning,” Li said. “But you have had so many similar experiments done.”

even volunteered for digital “suicide missions,” sacrificing themselves so the others could learn from their failures.

Gelbord said the OpenAI agents were relatively clumsy at their work, and were spotted by Hugging Face security two days after their first intrusion. “A skilled hacker driving an AI knows how to direct it in a way that is much more effective,” he said. But Gelbord added that the agents are bound to get better at it.

It’s tempting to view last week’s open letter as a classic “CYA memo,” an exercise in preemptive PR. Now if the worst happens, tech companies can say they told us so. Never mind that Big Tech created the threat in the first place, by turning generative AI tools loose upon an unprepared world.

There’s still time to shield our critical systems from intrusive AI, said Nair. Indeed, AI itself may save us, if we use its extraordinary powers to identify and fix security problems before the criminals can find them. But we’ve got to start now.

“It’s like knowing a hurricane is coming,” he said. “Maybe you never fixed that window, or your hurricane shutters are jammed. If you know it’s coming next week, are you going to fix it or not?”

N.H. sees job growth rebound as wages lag

$101,000 and Massachusetts at nearly $99,000 — the analysis notes that this metric doesn’t measure how income is distributed across the population or account for cost-of-living differences.

Notably, the report found many Granite Staters are still having a tough time finding work, and the number of labor force participants between the ages of 20 and 34 declined. That means the state’s workforce composition is shifting older, as concerns about affordability in housing, child care, and other areas influence young people’s decisions about whether to settle in the state. As more residents approach the traditional retirement age, New Hampshire will need younger people and newcomers to keep the labor supply growing, the report states.

‘When wages grow more slowly than the cost of everyday goods ... workers can be employed and still lose purchasing power.’

BEN REYNOLDS, lead author of job report

While the available data doesn’t show artificial intelligence having a big impact on the labor market in New Hampshire currently, the report notes that it will be important to monitor the availability of jobs where young workers have traditionally gained experience, as AI trends could lead to fewer openings and less entry-level hiring.

Gene Martin, the institute’s executive director, said the data offer encouraging signals along with a reminder that having more people employed is just one component of building a strong economy.

“This report shows that we still have work to do,” he said, “to make sure economic growth is reaching everyone.”

IN A BIG WIN, GOOGLE AVOIDS A BREAKUP OF ITS AD TECH BUSINESS

A federal judge ruled Wednesday that Google must make changes to address its advertising technology monopoly but would not need to break up that business, as the company staved off the most extreme measures to curb its power. Judge Leonie M. Brinkema, who sits on the US District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, issued her sealed decision after finding last year that Google broke the law to protect its dominance over the largely invisible system of technology that places ads on pages across the web. The ruling was previewed in a short order posted by the court. The Justice Department had requested that Google sell off parts of its business, which it said was necessary to check the company's power. But the judge declined to grant the request. She instead ordered Google to change its business practices to benefit competitors, though she did not provide specifics. The decision ensures that Google's power over the internet will be largely unchanged as it moves to dominate a technological era defined by artificial intelligence. Despite two federal court rulings in major government lawsuits declaring the tech giant a monopolist — the other in search — judges have not ordered significant structural changes to its $4.1 trillion business. Brinkema's decision to force Google to enforce some remedies is likely to have a limited effect on the tech giant's business overall, analysts said. Google's ad tech business brought in $30 billion last year, or about 8 percent of the revenue for its parent company, Alphabet. Its ad tech revenue has declined for 16 straight quarters, and analysts estimate it accounts for less than 1 percent of the company's profit. "We're very pleased the court rejected the DOJ's proposal to break apart tools that help small businesses reach new customers and grow," said Lee-Anne Mulholland, a vice president of regulatory affairs at Google. A spokesperson for the Justice Department said in a statement that its antitrust division was "pleased that the court ordered substantial relief" in the case and that it was "evaluating appropriate next steps." — NEW YORK TIMES

FORMER 7NEWS REPORTER LANDS AT ANOTHER BOSTON STATION

Less than a month after announcing her departure from the station, longtime 7News reporter Kimberly Bookman said this week that she will continue to cover Boston, joining NBC10 as of Sept. 14. Bookman announced in a LinkedIn post Tuesday that she was joining the NBC10 Boston team. Her last day on air with 7News was Aug. 4, after announcing her decision to leave the station after 12 years. Bookman, a Needham native, has been reporting in Boston since joining 7News in 2014. She said she is excited to continue reporting in the city as part of NBC10's news team. "I am going to continue to do what I love, in the city that I love," she wrote on LinkedIn. "I'm excited to join the team at NBC10 Boston. They are investing in the future of local news and in the many ways people are consuming and connecting to what's going on." ARTIFICIAL INTELLIGENCE

DOJ SIDES WITH OPENAI IN TIMES COPYRIGHT SUIT

The Justice Department told a Manhattan federal court that it was in the national interest for the judge to find that OpenAI did not violate copyright law when it used articles by The New York Times and other publishers to develop artificial intelligence systems. The filing late Tuesday was the first time the Justice Department weighed in on the use of copyrighted material by AI companies, which has led to several lawsuits, including one brought by the Times. The Justice Department argued that developing AI was critical to national security, and that training AI systems sufficiently transformed the written works to new material allowed under copyright law. It said the benefits of AI "far outweigh any competitive harm." The government's intervention is an escalation in the landmark litigation that could determine whether OpenAI violated the law when it was developing its AI systems and had harmed the news industry and other content creators. Stanley Woodward Jr., the associate attorney general for the Justice Department, called the filing "a historic statement of interest" in a statement posted on social media. Graham James, a spokesperson for the Times, said in a statement that the Justice Department was siding with a handful of "trillion-dollar AI companies" at the expense of American creators. Representatives for OpenAI did not respond to a request for comment. Microsoft, OpenAI's partner and a defendant in the Times' lawsuit, declined to comment. — NEW YORK TIMES

UBER CUTS 10% OF EMPLOYEES IN SWEEPING REORGANIZATION

Uber is laying off roughly 10 percent of its workforce, totaling about 3,300 people, as the ride-hailing company restructures to become "simpler and faster," CEO Dara Khosrowshahi said Wednesday. The layoffs are set to affect 20 percent of rank-and-file employees who are seven or more layers below Khosrowshahi, he said. He added that Uber would increase the number of employees under each manager by cutting teams that have only one to two workers by half, which would flatten the company. "A leaner organization will mean clearer ownership, faster decisions, and more time spent building rather than coordinating," Khosrowshahi said in a message to employees. "It will also generate savings that we intend to reinvest in growth, innovation, and the capabilities that will matter most over the coming years." He said Uber's revenue has nearly tripled over the past five years, but rapid growth has introduced "more layers, more coordination, and more fragmented ownership." In Wednesday's announcement, Uber said it would also consolidate its delivery operations and some engineering and science teams. — NEW YORK TIMES

SATURDAY EVENING POST WILL STOP PRINTING AFTER 205 YEARS

For more than two centuries, The Saturday Evening Post has chronicled American life in its pages, enshrining a homespun national identity and printing some of the nation's greatest writers. That's changing next year. The magazine's January issue will be its last in print, according to Joan SerVaas, the president and publisher. In a letter to the Post's 50,000 subscribers in the most recent issue, she attributed the decision to a combination of "rising production costs, declining advertising revenue, and shifting reader habits." "We've been dealing with it for over a decade," SerVaas said in an interview. "We continued hoping it would turn around or life would get better. Now we're pretty sure it's not going to get any better." The magazine, which debuted in 1821, will continue to publish new articles and fiction online. The archives, which will be preserved online, contain news articles as well as poetry, fiction, and art, including iconic images by Norman Rockwell. — NEW YORK TIMES

EMPLOYER HEALTH COSTS ARE EXPECTED TO SPIKE IN 2027

Large and small employers are bracing for what looks to be the sharpest increase in health care costs in more than two decades. The cost per worker is projected to go up an average of 11 percent next year, or somewhat lower if workers' insurance benefits are reduced, according to a US survey released Wednesday. The employers' final costs, after they make changes to health plans, are still expected to increase about 8 percent next year, the steepest since 2003, according to Marsh, the benefits consultant formerly known as Mercer. More than a third of the 1,800 employers surveyed said they anticipated that costs would rise at least 10 percent after making cuts. — NEW YORK TIMES

TRAVEL

SOUTHWEST TO LAUNCH FIRST AIRPORT LOUNGES TO BROADEN PREMIUM APPEAL

Southwest Airlines on Wednesday unveiled plans to open its first-ever airport lounges, as the carrier steps up efforts to attract higher-spending premium travelers and diversify revenue streams. The airline, which has been working to shed its low-cost image and boost ancillary revenue through assigned seating, extra-legroom seats, and other product enhancements, said it would partner with JPMorgan Chase to launch its first airport lounges. Airport lounges have become a powerful attraction for travelers as they offer a quieter place to work or relax, complimentary food and drinks, and a more seamless airport experience. For airlines, they help lock in customers, support premium fares, and drive spending on lucrative co-branded credit cards. Southwest will roll out a new Chase-issued co-branded credit card in 2027 to provide customers access to its airport lounge network. It initially plans to open four lounges in Austin, Baltimore, Honolulu, and Nashville. Construction is underway, with the lounges expected to begin opening in late 2027. — REUTERS

To boost Venezuela oil production, Eni, GE, Chevron team up

By Ari Natter, Kevin Crowley, and Tyler Kendall
BLOOMBERG

Executives from Chevron Corp., GE Vernova Inc., and Eni SpA joined US Energy Secretary Chris Wright and acting Venezuelan President Delcy Rodríguez to unveil a wave of energy deals aimed at boosting crude production.

The companies announced the agreements as part of a signing ceremony in Caracas on Wednesday, where Wright said the deals represented "tens of billions" worth of investments that marked a "transformation for Venezuela." Rodríguez said the historic moves will soon create economic growth, while thanking President Trump for his administration's efforts to reach "win-win" deals.

The deals represent the most significant capital investment by energy companies into the country since US special forces captured its former leader Nicolás Maduro in January. Just about nine months after Maduro's ouster, the Trump administration is showing major progress in its goal to increase crude output in the Americas.

Venezuela holds the world's largest reserves, but its fossil fuel industry has been worn down by years of mismanagement, corruption, and sanctions.

Trump announced a plan late last week to take majority control over a huge amount of Venezuela's oil wealth in an unprecedented maneuver that officials said would create the world's second-largest private oil company by reserves. The plan has come under sharp criticism that the Latin American nation will become a modern-day resource colony akin to the so-called banana republics of a century ago — something that could create long-term risks for oil companies operating there.

The US government negotiated for a 35 percent stake in Venezuelan entrepreneur Alejandro Betancourt's North American Blue Energy Partners, a privately held company granted 100-year concessions in 17 Venezuelan oil fields. Betancourt is a contentious figure in Venezuela, but the Trump administration has defended its decision to partner with the investor.

The US venture comes months after Trump laid out his vision for what he called the Donroe Doctrine — a 21st century version of the Monroe Doctrine that warned European powers against interfering in the Western Hemisphere. The developments are spurring analysts and academics to look back to an earlier era of neocolonialism, when the United States exerted outsized power over Latin America and its natural resources.

"We are massively interested in expanding energy production in the Americas," Wright said at the ceremony. "This is our neighborhood."

Chevron plans to invest $7 billion over the next five years through its joint venture partnerships to more than double crude production in Venezuela, the largest financial commitment so far in the US government-led push.

Houston-based Chevron won the right to develop two giant oil fields in the Carabobo area of the prolific Orinoco Belt, it said in a statement on Wednesday. The fields, Carabobo 1 and Carabobo-2-South-A, are located next to Chevron's Petroindpendencia joint venture, in which it has a 49 percent stake.

"We're building a very formidable position in what we consider to be some of the best geology in the country," chief executive Mike Wirth. "This is multiple billions of barrels of resource in place."

Wirth declined to comment on the US investment in NABEP, but said he appreciates the Trump administration's commitment to "commercial solutions" that will benefit both countries. "The administration recognizes Venezuela's energy resources can be an engine for both American energy security and Venezuelan economic recovery."

He said Chevron has "significant protections" built into the deal to safeguard its investments, but declined to go into detail about the contracts.

MassHealth drug tab up $350 million

By Alison Kuznitz
STATE HOUSE NEWS SERVICE

Pharmaceutical spending at MassHealth is projected to have climbed by about $350 million in the last fiscal year, according to a new agency report.

MassHealth estimates it will end up spending $3.36 billion on pharmaceutical utilization in fiscal 2026 — which spanned July 1, 2025, through June 30, 2026 — before rebates and federal reimbursements kick in, MassHealth chief Ryan Schwarz wrote in an Aug. 28 letter to top lawmakers. The agency predicts it will secure about $1.75 billion in total rebates, and that the federal financial participation rate will be 65.5 percent.

Schwarz said MassHealth spent $3.01 billion in fiscal 2025 on pharmaceuticals before rebates and federal matching dollars. The agency yielded $1.69 billion in rebates.

The increased spending was "driven by an increased utilization of high-cost drugs," Schwarz said without specifically invoking GLP-1 weight loss drugs that commercial insurers have widely stopped covering amid intense budget pressures. MassHealth also scrapped GLP-1 coverage in fiscal 2027 under an administrative change pushed by Governor Maura Healey.

Prescription drug spending at MassHealth increased by 18 percent from 2024 to 2025, with GLP-1 drugs accounting for less than half of that growth, according to a Healey administration budget brief.

MassHealth dominates the state budget, and officials are looking for other cost-saving strategies ahead of major federal funding losses. Total health care spending also repeatedly exceeds the state's cost containment benchmark, which the Center for Health Information and Analysis has attributed to soaring expenditures on prescription drugs and hospital outpatient services.

The Executive Office of Health and Human Services has active supplemental rebate contracts on nearly 100 drugs, including 11 "value-based agreements," Schwarz said. The fiscal 2020 budget gave EOHHS the authority to "directly and more effectively negotiate with drug manufacturers to come to supplemental and value-based rebate agreements."

"This has provided EOHHS with effective tools to pursue the best value for the Commonwealth through these agreements," Schwarz said. "This authority has also dramatically increased the pace at which EOHHS can enter into these agreements."

MassHealth started covering 71 new drugs in fiscal 2025, which translated into approximately $27 million in spending.
