

Wealthy back question on primaries — but why?

Their foes say it's all about money, but supporters point to idealistic reasons

The campaign to get rid of Massachusetts' partisan primaries has a fairly consistent type of donor.

There's $250,000 in contributions from John Connaughton, the chairman of Bain Capital, one of the world's largest investment firms. Andrew Balson, a former Bain executive who started his own private equity firm, has given nearly $800,000, while Mark Nunnally, another Bain alum, has chipped in a half-million dollars.

David "Randy" Peeler, who for years held a top position at Berkshire Partners, another private equity firm, has contributed more than $1 million.

They are part of a cohort of wealthy individuals with ties to various investment, private equity, and venture capital firms who have collectively contributed millions to the campaign pushing the ballot question. The donations have made the Coalition for Healthy Democracy the top-funded ballot question campaign this election cycle, though it is unclear why they are contributing in such large amounts.

Nearly $500,000 has flowed from those who identified as working for Bain Capital, records show. Another $250,000 came from others at Berkshire Partners beyond Peeler, who is listed as a senior adviser there. All told, the commit-

Putting the state's energy future into words

COMMENTARY

Here we go again. The business and environmental lobbies are at odds on Beacon Hill — and this time the fight's over a tiny, blink-and-you'll-miss-it section in a 170-page energy bill.

The controversial measure in question, approved by the Senate, would give legal cover to utilities to end natural gas service if they're directed to do so by state regulators, as long as alternatives exist. What alternatives? While geothermal is an option, we're mostly talking about electric heat.

Forcing people to switch from gas to electricity for heat, business leaders argue, gets expensive quickly because of conversion costs. The environmentalists disagree, particularly when factoring in the upkeep of the gas system, and claim a 2024 energy law already gives state officials this power anyway. The issue revolves around the state's "obligation to serve" that has blocked utilities from ending service to existing gas customers without their consent.

1 diocese still resists naming priests

Worcester bishop's stance on accused abusers angers survivors

For years, Worcester Bishop Robert McManus has balked at disclosing the names of all the priests in his diocese who had been credibly accused of abusing children, standing alone in opposition among the state's four Catholic leaders.

Now, McManus is under pressure to publicly release the names of every accused priest following a withering state report this week on sexual abuse by hundreds of Catholic clergy in Massachusetts.

In her blockbuster report released Wednesday, Attorney General Andrea Campbell found 90 clergy who had been accused of abuse in the Worcester diocese and 216 survivors, although she cautioned that investigators had not assessed the accusations for credibility.

Campbell, as well as survivors and watchdog groups, said disclosing their names is an important driver for healing and institutional accountability.

"It's been business as usual: Protect the church at all costs," said Dave Lewcon, 72, who said he was sexually abused as a teenager by a priest at St. Mary's Church in Uxbridge, which is in the Worcester diocese.

But the 75-year-old McManus has yet to waver from his decision to keep the names private.

He has, however, noted that the diocese in recent years reported every allegation to law enforcement and that church officials publish information on the diocesan website about every priest who has been placed on leave due to a credible report of abuse or who has been removed from clerical duties.

A spokesperson for McManus, Ray Delisle, added that "we will study the AG's report to identify any additional improvements that can be made to respond to victims of past abuse and to continue to

A welcome, yet feared, development

No one's quite sure what an improved Blue Hill Ave. would mean, but businesses in Black Boston wonder if they'll find themselves pushed out

Skye Warren grew up just off Blue Hill Avenue in Mattapan, within walking distance of a roller skating rink and a pizza place. Her short one-way street was the site of blow-out block parties where she and her friends performed dance routines and bands performed on a stage set up in front of her house. That brick-red triple decker, purchased by her grandparents in the 1960s, was the center of her family's universe, the north star guiding everyone home.

Today Warren, 31, is trying to make her way back. She owns a beauty business in Milton but is trying to buy a commercial space to move it to a few blocks from her childhood home. Doing so would put her in a prime position: owning property on Blue Hill Avenue before it gets a $164 million injection to revitalize the long-neglected commercial corridor linking Mattapan, Dorchester, and Roxbury.

Putting down roots in a neighborhood Warren's family has lived in for generations, closer to her clients' and employees' homes, is about more than being a property owner: It's about investing in the Black community.

You know that feeling when you show up for work on Monday after a vacation? That's how the Red Sox looked against the Yankees in the American League Wild Card Series.

A step slow and lacking energy; like everybody was waiting for tech support to reset their password so they could get back to work.

It showed up on the scoreboard at Yankee Stadium with a 9-0 loss in Game 1 on Tuesday and a season-ending 9-2 loss in Game 2 on Wednesday.

The Yankees scored 18 runs over 16 innings without star slugger Aaron Judge in their lineup. The Red Sox bullpen allowed 15 of those runs.

Offensively, the Red Sox struck out 19 times in 60 plate appearances and had four extra-base hits, three of them by Willson Contreras.

Woman in hospital after botched execution

Tenn. governor orders inquiry

By Kim Chandler and Kristin M. Hall
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Christa Pike was in critical condition Thursday and receiving “lifesaving care” at a hospital, her lawyers said, a day after a failed attempt to execute her pushed Tennessee’s governor to halt further executions this year and order an independent review.

Pike, who was sentenced to death for a 1995 murder, was taken to a hospital Wednesday night after surviving a double dose of the drug Tennessee uses to execute prisoners.

“We don’t have a sense of her prognosis or much update on her health at the moment,” attorney Randy Spivey said during a news conference. “But we know she is alive right now.”

The failed execution, which one death penalty expert described as unprecedented, led Governor Bill Lee to order a review, calling what happened “deeply disturbing” and indefinitely postponing Pike’s execution and another one that had been scheduled for this year. It also reignited the debate over the state’s execution procedures, including its single-drug lethal injections.

Spivey called the process cruel and torturous, saying he was “haunted” by watching and hearing Pike talking, singing, and then snoring loudly during her more than 90 minutes in the death chamber. Her attorneys also said it was unclear if she might have suffered brain damage from being deprived of oxygen.

May Martinez, whose daughter was murdered by Pike and her boyfriend and who traveled to Nashville to watch the execution, was also upset.

“I didn’t get justice for my daughter,” Martinez said Thursday.

“I watched the whole thing. She was awake. She was laughing. She was moving her head, moving her feet. She was trying to sit up,” Martinez said. “Didn’t work the first time they gave her a shot. It didn’t work the second time.”

The execution team worked for an hour to administer the lethal drugs, said Pike’s attorney, who counted at least seven needles in her left arm.

During the struggle to locate a vein, Pike even suggested where they might find one, he said.

“Please try here, please try here,” Spivey recalled her saying. “She told them over and over, please try higher on my shoulder.”

At one point, Pike asked prison officials if her arm was supposed to feel that way, though it’s unclear if it was after the first dose entered her body because officials don’t share that information.

Neither the initial nor backup dose of pentobarbital worked. Pike was still snoring when the execution chamber’s microphone was cut off more than an hour into the attempt.

Another of Pike’s attorneys, Steve Ferrell, said she feared there would be complications because of a lifelong blood disorder that made it tough to get needles into her veins.

It was quite possible, Ferrell said, that the IV line didn’t enter her vein properly and that the drug was filling her arm instead of entering her bloodstream.

Pike’s lawyers now want her death sentence to be commuted. Now age 50, she was sentenced to death for a murder she committed at 18. She would have been the first woman executed in Tennessee in more than 200 years.

An appeals court had stopped her execution an hour before it was scheduled to begin Wednesday morning, but the US Supreme Court overturned that stay hours later.

It was the second time this year that Tennessee was unable to complete an execution. In the other case, officials couldn’t find a suitable vein for an IV line so the drugs weren’t administered.

Lee said it appeared that prison staff followed procedure, and that there was no clear sense Thursday about what went wrong.

Pentobarbital, the barbiturate Tennessee uses for executions, has been used to carry out death sentences in multiple states and by the federal government. But there have been concerns raised about the potential for “unnecessary pain and suffering.”

Miami rapper facing domestic battery charge

MIAMI BEACH, Fla. — Rapper Rick Ross was arrested in Miami Beach early Thursday and charged with battery related to a domestic violence accusation, authorities said.

Ross, whose legal name is William Roberts II, faces a felony charge of battery by strangulation, as well as a misdemeanor battery charge, according to online court records.

An attorney for Ross, 50, said in a statement that Ross is being wrongfully accused by an ex-girlfriend whose true motivations are unclear.

“The ex did not even file a police report until a month after the claimed incident allegedly took place,” defense attorney Steve Sadow said in the statement. “Mr. Roberts is innocent and has pled not guilty to the charges. He respectfully requests that his friends, fans, and the general public not prejudge the situation and allow the judicial process to run its course.”

Jail records showed that Ross was being held Thursday morning on $5,000 bail. An arraignment is scheduled for Oct. 22.

Ross is a longtime South Florida resident who gained prominence in 2006 with his debut single “Hustlin’”

The rapper and entrepreneur helped put Miami on the musical map in the early 2000s, when most hip-hop fans looked to Atlanta and Houston as Southern rap headquarters. “Hustlin’” was certified platinum twice by the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA) and sparked a bidding war for Ross. He eventually signed with Def Jam Records, headed by Jay-Z.

Toddler brings gun to day care

CANTON TOWNSHIP, Mich. — The parents of a 3-year-old Detroit-area boy who had a loaded gun in his backpack at a day care were charged with misdemeanor crimes Thursday as prosecutors also revealed the firearm was passed to other children before a staff member intervened.

The gun was not fired, and no one was injured.

“It is very unsettling to think about what may have happened in this case,” Wayne County prosecutor Kym Worthy said.

One parent was charged with violating Michigan’s gun storage law, while the other parent, a Detroit-area police officer, was charged with creating a risk of harm, which is fourth-degree child abuse. They appeared in court and were released on bond.

The gun was in a holster Monday when the boy pulled it from a backpack at Childrens World Early Learning Center in Canton Township and shared it with other children, the prosecutor’s office said. It was not the officer’s work weapon.

Under state law, firearms must be locked up at home when children are present.

Two killed in Calif. helicopter crash

A medical helicopter transporting a patient crashed off Catalina Island near Los Angeles, killing two people and leaving two hospitalized, authorities said Thursday.

Rescuers continued searching Thursday for a fifth person who was aboard the aircraft and went missing after the Wednesday night crash.

The Coast Guard, area firefighters, and divers with the Los Angeles County Sheriff’s Department were among emergency personnel who worked through the night, Coast Guard Captain Stacey Crecy said.

“We’re still doing an active search for the person who’s missing, and then, in addition to that, the divers and the remote operated vehicle are going to get a look at more of the wreckage and hopefully if there’s a sunken fuselage ... we’re hoping to get a better picture of that this morning,” Crecy said.

The cause of the crash was not immediately clear. Crecy said the helicopter went down shortly after takeoff and hit the water a short distance from the island.

Authorities were working on identifying the victims, she said.

Four astronauts launched to International Space Station

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — Four astronauts rocketed into orbit Thursday on a space station mission that will stretch until spring, among them a Canadian whose wife will give birth while he’s away.

SpaceX launched commander Jessica Watkins and her crew for NASA after a three-week delay to fix the Dragon capsule’s leaking fuel system. Thick clouds threatened to halt the countdown, but in the end, the skies cleared enough to allow for a safe liftoff.

Although their stay at the International Space Station will last a long six months, the flight there promised to be the quickest yet for Elon Musk’s company: a mere eight-hour transit with an arrival well before bedtime.

With the late morning liftoff from Cape Canaveral Space Force Station, Watkins became the first Black woman to lead a crew to orbit. A geologist who worked with NASA’s Mars rover Curiosity a decade ago, Watkins is making her second trip to the space station following a lengthy stay in 2022.

Justices to review migrant detention

Policy departs from past practice

By Ann E. Marimow

NEW YORK TIMES

The Supreme Court on Thursday agreed to review the Trump administration’s policy of indefinitely detaining immigrants who crossed the border illegally years ago, signaling the court plans to weigh in on major pieces of President Trump’s aggressive deportation agenda as it begins its new term Monday.

The policy is a departure from past practice, when such migrants were generally allowed an opportunity to seek release after a hearing before a judge.

The justices previously announced that they would fast-track a separate case testing the administration’s policy of deporting immigrants to countries where they have no ties, including nations that have faced allegations of human rights abuses.

Between the two cases, the justices will consider the legality of some of the most controversial aspects of the Trump administration’s efforts to rapidly expel millions of migrants living in the United States.

The justices also added two other cases to the docket of issues they will hear and decide by next June.

One is a Kentucky case about whether a federal religious discrimination law protects a group of Catholic priests who want to build a shrine to the Virgin Mary over neighbors’ objections. The other is a divorce dispute over military benefits originating in North Dakota.

The immigration case the court accepted Thursday involved noncitizens who entered the United States illegally but had been living in the country for years. For decades, such people could be released on bond pending additional court proceedings, so long as they were not found to be a threat to public safety or a flight risk.

But last year, the Trump administration announced a new interpretation of a 1996 law, concluding it allowed noncitizens living in the United States to be held without bond. As a result, immigration judges have denied hearings to people, even if they have been living and working in the United States for years.

More than 500 district court judges and nine of 11 federal appeals courts to consider the issue have rejected the administration’s new detention rule and its interpretation of the immigration law at issue.

About 70,000 people are currently in immigration detention across the United States, up from 40,000 before Trump took office in January 2025.

More than two-thirds of immigrants in the country illegally have lived in the United States for at least a decade.

Most of the appeals courts to consider the issue have said the government should have provided hearings to determine whether they posed a danger to others or a flight risk pending the completion of removal proceedings.

In April, the 2nd US District Court of Appeals sided with a Brazilian citizen, Ricardo Aparecido Barbosa Da Cunha, who has lived in the United States for about 20 years.

He was arrested by federal agents on his way to work in Massachusetts, where he owns a construction business and a home with his wife, also a Brazilian citizen, and their two children, who are US citizens.

He crossed the US border with Mexico in 2004, applied for asylum in 2016, and was granted a work permit. He had not previously been detained and has no known criminal history.

In its decision, the appeals court noted that Congress had never challenged the settled practice of releasing certain migrants on bond despite making major changes to immigration law.

Trump warns Iran over cockpit attack

President hints at Tehran link; motive unclear

JERUSALEM — President Trump said Thursday that if Iran is linked to the copilot who tried to crash an Israel-bound flight, the Islamic Republic would be struck “very hard” for the attempt on the lives of more than 180 people aboard the jet.

Trump issued the warning as investigators worked to determine why the copilot stabbed the flight’s captain, causing the FlyDubai plane to plummet before others on board stopped the attack and landed the airliner in Saudi Arabia.

The president was asked by reporters at the White House whether he had been briefed about any links between the pilot behind the attack and Tehran. He said, “We’re working on it right now.”

“I would say the answer, based on what I’m hearing, is yes, but we’re working on it right now,” Trump said. He did not elaborate about why he suspects Iran might be involved.

Asked if the US would retaliate against Tehran if it was behind the attack, Trump said, “Oh they’ll be hit, very hard, don’t worry.”

“You just ask them,” he added.

ed. “They know what happened. They’ll be hit very hard.”

His remarks came as diplomatic efforts to end the war appear to have stalled.

Iranian officials indicated Wednesday that they received an official US response to their latest proposal to end the seven-month war, which Trump had publicly rejected just days earlier. The officials did not say what the response contained and whether it was a rejection.

Trump said in a Time magazine interview published Thursday that he will not accept proposals from Iran that “he wouldn’t have approved a year ago,” and left open the possibility of resuming bombing after the Nov. 3 US election.

Meanwhile, the American military has dispatched roughly 9,000 troops aboard a group of ships to the Middle East, a US official said Thursday. That could mean three carriers will be in the region as soon as late October, according to the official, who spoke on condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive military operations.

Despite Trump’s public rebuff, mediators have continued working with Iran and the US to try to broker a deal to end the fighting and open the Strait of Hormuz, according to officials who were not authorized to comment publicly and spoke on condition of anonymity.

mostly Israelis, from the United Arab Emirates to Tel Aviv — have described how the bloodied Indian captain managed to open the cockpit door to let them in before they grappled with the copilot and stabilized a descent so sharp that the plane’s rudder was torn away.

“We felt helpless, suspended in midair, and I didn’t know who to turn to. But it was all instinct to survive,” Asaf Rajuan, who was among those who intervened, said in a statement shared by Israel’s presidency.

A regional official briefed on the investigation said the suspect, an Omani citizen, was under arrest and confirmed that Saudi authorities were working with countries, including Israel, to try to determine a motive. He said the UAE, the United States, and Oman also were involved. Saudi Arabia said the copilot had been handed over to the UAE.

“All possible scenarios, from terrorism to mental disorders, are being looked into. Nothing is ruled out for now,” said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, without giving details, claimed the attacker underwent Islamist indoctrination. Asked who helped radicalize him, the prime minister told Fox News channel’s “Fox and Friends” he did not know.

When asked by AP how the prime minister knew the copilot underwent indoctrination, Netanyahu’s office said it would not comment.

Netanyahu told Fox that the suspect apparently got through a loophole in Israeli aviation rules that normally bar pilots from flying to Israel if they are from countries that do not have diplomatic relations with Israel, which Oman does not.

The copilot has not been publicly identified. Video shot inside the plane by Dr. Shota Musayev, a dentist who treated the captain, shows the copilot on his knees, with his hands tied behind his back.

Captain Smit Machchhar, widely praised as one of the heroes of the flight, was recovering in the Emirati capital of Abu Dhabi, the Indian government said Thursday.

It was not clear what the copilot used as a weapon.

Israeli intelligence and security officials were in Saudi Arabia to help investigate the copilot, according to another regional official who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak to the media.

Israel has requested that the copilot be sent to Israel for the investigation, though it was unclear if that request would be granted, the official said.

Saudi Arabia does not have formal diplomatic ties with Israel, but the countries have long cooperated on security and intelligence matters.

Terror at 30,000 feet: plumber and dentist to the rescue

Passengers tell how they saved plummeting jet

By Cara Anna
ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM — A captain, despite being stabbed, managed to open the cockpit door. A dentist and other passengers wrestled with a violent copilot. A plumber seized the controls as the plane plunged toward the desert — all helping save the 182 people aboard the Israel-bound flight.

“Hollywood isn’t creative enough to come up with stories like this!” said Mike Huckabee, the US ambassador to Israel.

Although major questions remained unanswered on Thursday about the attacker and his motive, the story of ordinary passengers saving the FlyDubai flight from disaster has quickly become the stuff of legend.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu warmly embraced plumber Yaniv Hayoun shortly after the passengers arrived in Tel Aviv late on Wednesday. He later posted a five-star review of Hayoun’s professional services, calling him “a hero who has saved many lives.”

“He can help you too — I highly recommend him!” Netanyahu added on X.

Hayoun was among several Israelis recommended for the Presidential Award for Civilian Heroism, while Indian Captain Smit Machchhar was called “a HERO” by Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi.

Many of the details emerged in a rush shortly after the passengers, most of them Israeli, landed back home to cheers and waving flags.

Hayoun, apologizing for his bloody shirt, within minutes was telling the prime minister and journalists what happened.

There had been little time for him and the others to think. Passengers screamed after spotting the copilot stabbing the captain, and the flight from Dubai, in the United Arab Emirates, to the Israeli city of Tel Aviv began a steep dive. Some believed they were about to die.

A handful of Israelis reacted, hurtling up the aisle after the badly wounded captain managed to open the cockpit door. That was crucial, as cockpit doors are typically locked to prevent hijackings.

They had to struggle, Hayoun said, with the captain’s body resting against it.

Hayoun said the copilot appeared to be trying to damage the plane’s controls. He grabbed the copilot, and others began struggling with the man.

Hayoun then tackled the controls. He had no training, but he remembered what he had seen in movies.

“I asked him, how did you know how to do that? And he said, ‘Well, I, I watched these air disaster films,’” Netanyahu told Fox News on Thursday.

It was not clear who among the passengers had security experience, though military service is compulsory for most men and women in Israel.

UK-Iranian national arrested in alleged plot

LONDON — Police on Thursday arrested a dual UK-Iranian national on suspicion of plotting a terror attack following a security incident at a US-run military air base in England that British authorities have linked to Tehran.

Kidnappings by violent gangs on rise in Haiti

PORT-AU-PRINCE — Kidnappings are on the rise in Haiti, with gangs increasingly targeting high-profile people and launching mass abductions as the country pushes to hold long-awaited presidential elections.

At least 81 people were reported kidnapped between April and June alone, a 42 percent increase compared with the first quarter of the year, according to UN statistics. Those abducted include James Boyard, police inspector general and cabinet director of Haiti’s Defense Ministry. He was kidnapped during broad daylight in June from Bourdon, a Port-au-Prince neighborhood considered relatively safe. He has not been released.

Also kidnapped are well-known attorney Caleb Jean-Baptiste and Stéphanie Paultre, director general of Haiti’s National Office for Educational Partnerships, according to local media reports.

The kidnappings come as Haiti prepares to hold general elections for the first time in more than a decade.

Court grants legal protection to human voice

TOKYO — A Tokyo court has awarded legal protection to the human voice in a landmark case in which a popular Japanese anime voice actor demanded that TikTok close an account over its unauthorized use of an artificial intelligence clone of his trademark baritone.

The Tokyo District Court’s decision Wednesday was the first acknowledgment of the right to one’s voice in Japan. The ruling was good news for many anime voice actors at a time when they are increasingly concerned about the use of AI-generated versions of their voices.

The plaintiff, Kenjiro Tsuda, is an actor best known for his “lustrous and deep” voice in starring characters such as Ken-to Nanami in “Jujutsu Kaisen,” a popular anime series.

In his lawsuit, Tsuda said that the anonymous operator of the TikTok account “Nanami” wrongfully profited by attracting viewers with his voice narrating in more than 180 videos about urban legends and paranormal phenomena, and asked for the material to be deleted.

Cornell police statement omitted claim of rape

Prosecutor was not informed of key assertion

By Hurubie Meko
NEW YORK TIMES

At a campus police department Nov. 14, 2024, a Cornell University sophomore detailed how she found herself naked in a fraternity house nearly a month before, with a “ring of men” around her. She was drunk and had been given ketamine, she said. Her phone was across the room.

“There was really no escape,” she said.

The woman spoke for hours with an officer, telling him how what began as a consensual sexual encounter with a man she liked spiraled into a prolonged drug-fueled attack by several men inside the Chi Phi fraternity house.

“I don’t remember the very end of the event where I was raped,” she told them. “I can say with 100 percent confidence I was raped.”

The officer then condensed the interview into a six-page “voluntary statement” written from her perspective, according to documents obtained by The New York Times. The student, after leaving about 20 handwritten corrections on a draft, signed a final version the next day.

While the shorter statement explained that she felt some of that night’s events were a crime, it omitted some of the more forceful and definitive language she used. And it was missing her unequivocal statement that she had been raped. The omission, which for a time seemed to end the case, instead now appears to have only delayed a case that has roiled the campus and renewed the national debate how colleges handle claims of sexual assault.

That condensed statement was shared with the district attorney, Matthew Van Houten, who decided there was not enough evidence to bring criminal charges against the seven men. It looked like the case was over.

Van Houten’s decision in 2024 largely happened quietly, through a process that is often shielded from public scrutiny. Cornell, though, conducted its own investigation. That investigation, which the Times has reviewed, concluded months after the woman dropped out of Cornell because of the incident.

Then last month the woman, as Jane Doe, filed a lawsuit against Cornell, the seven men, the fraternity, and her sorority. The lawsuit ricocheted online, plunging the university into a crisis and landing Van Houten’s office in a maelstrom of criticism. Many in the public, including politicians and celebrities, began questioning what law enforcement officials knew about the woman’s allegations two years ago and why a criminal case was never pursued.

The men have not been charged criminally, and during the university investigation the men almost universally denied the accusations against them and said any sex that took place was consensual. Several of the men suggested that Jane Doe had not only initiated the sexual encounters, but in some cases, had done so without asking.

Van Houten has defended his office’s decision and said he wants to meet with the woman this week as he considers bringing new evidence to a grand jury.

In a nine-page public statement Monday, Van Houten said the statement the woman provided at the time did not “allege she was drugged against her will or gang raped.”

“On the contrary, Jane Doe’s statement described her participation in drug and sexual conduct as voluntary, conscious, and consensual,” he wrote.

But in the documents reviewed by the Times, the Cornell police did not inform Van Houten’s office that Jane Doe had said she had been raped. It’s unclear what other conversations the police and district attorney’s office had about the case.

On Nov. 25, the officer who took Jane Doe’s statement filed a document and said he contacted an investigator in the district attorney’s office to talk.

The officer reported that he was told, based on a review of Jane Doe’s statement, that the prosecutor’s office had decided that “criminal charges would not be pursued in this case.”

“Nothing further at this time,” he wrote.

THE ATACAMA DESERT, Chile — Spring has finally arrived in the Southern Hemisphere and, in Chile, even the desert is blossoming.

Known as the driest nonpolar desert on Earth, a massive portion of the Atacama Desert has been covered in flowers after the El Niño weather pattern brought heavy rains to the region earlier this year. The unusually large amount of water allowed millions of seeds and bulbs to sprout and bloom, many of them after remaining dormant for decades.

“It is a unique phenomenon; there are more than 200 plant species,” said Jorge Carabantes, head of the Protected Areas Department at the National Forest Corporation. “This is a flowering event that is obviously extraordinary and unusual, very different from other blooms that occur elsewhere on the globe.”

The Atacama lies between the Pacific Ocean and the Andes Mountains, stretching some 1,000 miles all the way down the northern coast of Chile.

Although flowering is common during the transition from winter to spring, this year the rocky, brownish dunes that make up the desert’s traditional landscape have turned into a vibrant, colorful carpet of wildflowers during a historic Desierto Florido, or “flowering desert.”

“I always thought it was just going to be brown. That’s my image of a desert, just brown,” said Felix Banda, 51, who was born in Chile but has lived his whole life in Australia. “I knew that it had rained a lot, so I was expecting to see some beautiful greenery, but this is an incredible landscape,” he added about his first visit to the Atacama.

Between July and August, Chile recorded record rainfall in several regions, with some levels never seen since measurements began in the 1950s. The heavy precipitation was driven by a super El Niño, a climate phenomenon that causes sharp rises in global temperatures and is becoming increasingly strong.

“Since rainfall records began, these are the most significant figures in terms of volume: 160, 180, 190 millimeters (6 to 7 inches) in some locations,” explained biologist César Pizarro, head of the Biodiversity Conservation Section at CONAF Atacama. “What has happened now has an origin, and it is called ‘super El Niño.’”

The storms have caused flooding, havoc, and devastation in several parts of Chile. In the north, they have also enabled the historic desert bloom, with an estimated coverage of some 6,560 square miles this year. This area is similar in size to the Santiago Metropolitan Region, the country’s largest and most populous area.

According to CONAF projections, this is expected to be the most intense and extensive Desierto Florido since 1997.

That’s because, Pizarro said, the heavy rainfall activated the desert’s biological material, known as germplasm. This includes seeds, bulbs, and tubers but also the eggs of various invertebrates and reptiles.

The result is a true visual spectacle featuring more than 200 species of plants and flowers in a variety of colors, shapes, and forms. Red and yellow ñañucas, purple rock purslane, white suspiros, orange terciopelos and the native garra de león, one of the desert’s most iconic species, have transformed the hills, plains and ravines of the Atacama.

“There are hills and mountain ranges where no greenery or flowers had been seen for more than 30 or 40 years,” Pizarro added. “This desert germplasm can remain (dormant) for many years, even decades.”

Whether arriving from within Chile or overseas, tourists are venturing into the remote, inhospitable areas of the Atacama to admire the millions of flowers adorning vast areas of the desert, stretching from the coast to the horizon.

Russia to increase war budget, cuts to social programs

Military takes up over one-third of planned spending

NEW YORK TIMES

The Kremlin plans to sharply increase spending on the war in Ukraine, even at the cost of ballooning debt, cuts to health care and other social programs, and higher taxes, according to a draft 2027 budget made public Wednesday.

Russia and Ukraine are engaged in a war of attrition that, beyond deadly fighting on the front lines, includes an intense battle to cripple each other’s economies. As the war approaches its fifth anniversary, both sides are finding it increasingly difficult to finance the conflict.

Ukraine has targeted Russian fuel refineries, causing lines at gas stations. As the attacks cut Russian oil output, Moscow has been unable to fully take advantage of an increase in global oil prices caused by the war in Iran. Kyiv has also been striking Russian e-commerce giants, disrupting supply chains for online retailers and wiping out inventories for many merchants.

In Ukraine, officials have said that Russia is waging “total war” against the country with assaults against ports, grocery and pharmaceutical warehouses, data centers, and other targets. Relentless air raids on major cities like Kyiv, the capital, have slowed economic activity.

Judging by next year’s Russian budget, President Vladimir Putin is not planning to stop.

Russia intends to spend more than $200 billion on its military in 2027, an increase of more than a quarter from the sum the last budget initially provided for 2026. The new figure represents more than a third of overall federal spending planned next year.

Speaking Wednesday at the opening session of the lower house of Russia’s parliament, Putin exuded confidence.

Referring to Ukraine’s need to seek financial help from its European allies, he said that “Russia cannot go around the world, humiliatingly begging for handouts with an outstretched hand.”

“First, because, as I have said, it is humiliating,” he said. “Second, we know full well that no one is going to give us handouts. And third, and most important, we do not need them. Russia’s financial system and economy are performing well.”

The numbers tell a less rosy story.

A year ago, the Russian government projected a slight decrease in military spending for 2026 and 2027. But with peace talks foundering and the war only escalating in the past year, the Kremlin now plans to trim spending on social programs, including child and family allowances, in order to increase expenditures on the war. Such social spending will fall by 7 percent.

Allocations for education will be cut by 6 percent, while spending on health care, such as cancer treatment infrastructure, will be reduced by nearly 7 percent, according to the draft budget.

Russia will also expand its national debt, with the budget deficit exceeding $60 billion next year. Although Putin often boasts about Russia’s relatively low debt — currently around 20 percent of the country’s gross domestic product — Western sanctions have forced the government to borrow almost entirely domestically, primarily from state banks at bond interest rates sometimes exceeding 15 percent.

According to the draft budget, Russia’s debt-servicing costs next year will more than double in real terms from prewar levels, surpassing expenditures on health care, education, and housing combined.

To help offset the strain, Russia will raise taxes again. The Russian finance minister announced in late September that the government would raise taxes on bank deposit interest, dividends, and asset sales, including real estate.

That is expected to bring in an additional $4.6 billion. The government has also proposed a new tax on mining companies.

Jamaica struggles to recover a year after Hurricane Melissa struck

By John Myers Jr.
ASSOCIATED PRESS

KINGSTON, Jamaica — Jamaica’s once-flourishing tourism sector is struggling to regain its footing nearly a year after Hurricane Melissa slammed into the island as a Category 5 storm.

High deductibles and delays in insurance claim settlements mean that hotels and other businesses are running out of operating capital as Jamaica’s peak winter travel season approaches.

An estimated 20 hotels remain closed nearly a year after Melissa hit, killing dozens of people and causing an estimated $12 billion in damage, much of it in the island’s northwest re-

Tourism represents up to 35 percent of Jamaica’s GDP. It also accounts for more than half of the country’s total foreign exchange earnings and employs roughly one in four workers when indirect jobs are factored in.

The greatest hurdle to full recovery of the tourism sector isn’t the availability of construction materials or labor; it’s a mounting insurance crisis characterized by severe payout delays, massive deductions, and a crippling cash shortfall.

“Claims are being paid slowly and settled short, and that leaves a working-capital hole across the sector,” said O’Brian Heron, president of the Jamaica Hotel and Tourist Association.

According to the association, more than 61 percent of claimants are awaiting full settlements, leaving operators struggling to finance their own rebuilding efforts.

More than eight in 10 association members submitted a property or business interruption claim after the hurricane, underscoring the widespread impact on the sector.

Despite the insurance industry’s public commitment to resolve the bulk of non-litigated claims by the end of September, this has not happened.

Damages from the hurricane are the equivalent of roughly 57 percent of Jamaica’s GDP, and the physical and economic scars of the storm are profound.

Commercial claims filed by Jamaica’s hospitality sector make up the bulk of the island’s projected $2.2 billion to $4.2 billion in total private insured losses.

The disruption to room stock caused a 17 percent drop in visitor arrivals and an 18 percent drop in tourism revenue, costing the country roughly $550 million in lost earnings.

Tourism stakeholders argue that the problem is how claims are being processed and under-valued. According to Jamaica’s Hotel and Tourism Association, seven in 10 claimants reported facing deductions that exceed what they understood their policies allowed under the controversial “average clause” — a provision that penalizes policyholders if a property is deemed underinsured. For nearly a third of claimants, these deductions have slashed the value of their claims by more than 40 percent.

“Complexity is not an acceptable excuse for delay, still less for silence, and it does not justify deductions beyond the policy terms,” Heron said.

Insurers have blamed the delays on the complex nature of commercial hotel claims and a severe shortage of licensed property adjusters in Jamaica. They point out that fewer than half the number of loss adjusters registered with the Financial Services Commission are licensed to handle property claims, leading to a severe backlog.

Wealthy backing primaries question — but why?

►DONORS
tee has pulled in more than $5.6 million in donations since last year.

That support has fueled attacks from the question's opponents, who allege that the wealthy donors are trying to “buy elections” in Massachusetts.

But their exact motivations are unclear. Nor is there an apparent ideological motive. None of the committee's top donors responded to requests for comment sent to them or their firms, including spokespeople for Bain.

Danielle Allen, a Harvard University professor who is leading the campaign, chalked up the support to “social relationships” she's built. She called Peeler a friend she has known in the democracy reform space; he and others also put large donations behind an unsuccessful ranked-choice voting ballot question in 2020. Balson and Nunnelly are both “people who care about democracy,” Allen said.

“I've got a fair amount of experience organizing, and you do what an organizer does: You ask your friends to ask friends, and you keep snowballing out,” said Allen, a former gubernatorial candidate who has criticized the party nominating process.

“I have been a bulldog,” she said of her fund-raising efforts.

The proposal Allen is pitching this fall would eliminate the party primary process for state elections, and instead establish a system in which all candidates would be listed on a single primary ballot, regardless of party. Voters could vote for only one candidate; the top two vote-getters would advance to the general election.

Supporters of the measure have argued that the change would shift the power over ballot access from the Republican and Democratic party appara-tuses to voters. They also say it would generate more competition in a state that's long lacked competitive elections, particularly at the legislative level.

But opponents contend that eliminating partisan primaries would open Massachusetts elections to the influence of wealthy individuals who can spend large sums of money on their own political bids or their preferred candidates.

Some have also warned it could wipe out any chance of a third-party or independent candidate qualifying for the general election, or further diffuse the ability of Republicans — who already are a super-minority in the Legislature and hold no statewide office — to compete in November.

The ballot measure has also deeply divided Democrats around the state, and drawn opposition from the leaders of the two major political parties.

Jordan Berg Powers, the chair of the union-backed committee opposing the ballot question, said the investment-world executives' donations are concerning because it's a “big play to upend the system to really benefit themselves.”

“You look around the country, and you're a private equity person, what are you worried about? You're worried about populism from both the left and the right. You're worried about bills that will rein in the investment you've made,” Berg Powers said. “They have an interest in having politicians and a system that privileges their money.”

Christian Grose, a University of Southern California political science professor who has studied the effect of his state's “top-two” system since it was implemented in 2012, said the impact of money in California elections isn't “any more or less than closed primary systems.”

JONATHAN WIGGS/GLOBE STAFF/FILE

Danielle Allen, a Harvard University professor who is leading the campaign on the primaries question, chalked up the support to “social relationships” she's built.

“There's lots of money in politics,” he said.

Allen also pushed back on the argument that a top-two system would benefit wealthy individuals. She pointed to the nonpartisan preliminary election used in Boston ahead of the general election.

“If this kind of system advantaged money, then Josh Kraft would be mayor of Boston,” Allen said, referring to Kraft's failed 2025 challenge of Mayor Michelle Wu in which he reported spending more than $6.6 million.

Ballot question campaigns often require large sums of money to be successful, to fund signature-gathering efforts, pay attorneys to draft language, hire campaign staff, and litter television and social media with advertising.

Allen said she has worked on the all-party primaries movement for five years, and initially funded it with cash from her retirement account. State records show she gave $80,000 in September 2023 to a now-defunct campaign committee associated with the measure.

Allen's current campaign has raised more money than the 20 other ballot question committees that are either supporting or opposing any of the nine questions slated to go before voters in November.

Many of the donors have heavily donated to past political causes that drew a mix of ideological support.

Nunnelly, the Bain alum, gave $275,000 while working in Charlie Baker's administration to a 2016 campaign supporting an unsuccessful ballot initiative to lift the cap on the number of charter schools in the state — a measure the former governor, too, aggressively campaigned for.

Balson, the former Bain executive who is now managing partner at Cove Hill Partners, also gave hundreds of thousands of dollars to a ballot question committee supporting the charter school measure, and put at least $200,000 behind the unsuccessful ballot question in 2020 that would have implemented ranked-choice voting in the state.

Balson is also a longtime political contributor of Attorney General Andrea Campbell, giving $250,000 in 2021 to a super PAC that backed Campbell's unsuccessful bid for Boston mayor. Nunnelly also gave the PAC $75,000, state records show.

Similar to Balson and Nunnelly, Peeler, the longtime Berkshire Partners executive, has financially supported ballot questions in Massachusetts for at least a decade, giving at least $75,000 in 2016 to the failed charter schools expansion push and $50,000 to the ranked-choice voting campaign, records show. He also gave at least $500,000 last year to American Promise, a Concord-based nonprofit focused on limiting money in politics.

Nathan Lockwood, chief of staff at Voter Choice Massachusetts, a nonprofit focused on advocating for ranked-choice voting that backed the 2020 ballot question, said Peeler holds “progressive values and a pragmatic mind.”

“He's devoted a massive portion of his time and attention to conversation, thinking, and investing in making Massachusetts a better place — often against the preferences of his own colleagues, who would prefer he focus only on ‘other states that need it more,’ ” Lockwood said.

Other major donations to the primary ballot question include $200,000 from Paul Sagan, an adviser at General Catalyst Partners, and $100,000 each from Adam Koppel, a partner at Bain Capital, and Paul Edgerley, a senior adviser at the firm.

None of them returned requests for comment.

Adam Webster, a Massachusetts-based Democratic political consultant who is not involved with the ballot question campaign, said the wealth behind the committee feeds into the criticisms that the proposed system could ultimately benefit those with the most money.

“This,” he said of the ballot question, “is really a way to subvert the ‘small-d’ democratic grass-roots campaign process where candidates need to meet and greet voters, local elected officials, activists.”

Family sues US over ICE killing in Minn.

Seeks damages for death of Renee Good

By Tim Sullivan, Kathy McCormack, and Mark Vancleave
ASSOCIATED PRESS

MINNEAPOLIS — Renee Good's family sued the US government and the architects of President Trump's immigration crackdown Thursday, saying “the time is absolutely now for accountability” for her killing in January by a federal agent in Minneapolis.

Good's partner, Becca Good, and her brother Brent Ganger on behalf of her larger family, accused the government and Jonathan Ross, the Immigration and Customs Enforcement officer who shot into her SUV and killed her, of unjustified and excessive use of force.

The Jan. 7 shooting, captured on bystander video, was “the predictable and intended product” of the Trump administration's crackdown on Somali and other immigrants in Minnesota dubbed Operation Metro Surge, according to one of the two lawsuits.

“She was the love of my life,” Becca Good said at a news conference announcing the lawsuits. “I'm here today because last January, the whole world had to watch as our entire universe was destroyed — as the sunshine who was my amazing Renee was robbed from us, from her children, and from her community.”

The killings of Good, a 37-year-old mother of three, and another US citizen, Alex Pretti, in Minneapolis just weeks later sparked outrage across the country and calls to rein in immigration enforcement. At least 10 people have died in encounters with immigration officers during Trump's second term.

The crackdown, a pillar of Trump's second term, has prompted a slew of lawsuits filed by everyone from Chicago-area pastors to more than a dozen states and the cities of Minneapolis and St. Paul. Hundreds of protesters have been arrested, but few have been convicted of any crimes.

“What happened to Renee was completely senseless,” Ganger said. “And the fact that there's been no accountability, no investigation, no expression of condolence, no change in policy is completely mind blowing.”

The lawsuits — one against the government, the other against Ross and officials including White House Deputy Chief of Staff Stephen Miller, ex-Homeland Security Secretary Kristi Noem, and White House border czar Tom Homan — seek unspecified damages for wrongful death, conspiracy, and other violations.

“Our government has become a grave and mortal threat to its own citizens,” the family's lawyer, Antonio Romanucci, told reporters.

The Justice Department has not responded to an email seeking comment.

Renee Good was killed while driving with Becca on a street where masked federal immigration officers were conducting an enforcement operation. They had just dropped their 6-year-old son at school. Renee stopped their red SUV in the street and honked her horn to warn people about the operation while Becca got out and started recording video with her cellphone.

Bystander video shows Renee Good in the driver's seat, her car blocking part of the road, as she repeatedly honks the horn. Two immigration officers get out of a truck, their faces covered, and one orders Good to get out of the car. She reverses briefly, then turns the steering wheel as an officer again demands: “Get out of the car.”

Almost simultaneously, Becca Good, standing in the street, shouts: “Drive, baby, drive!”

The officer standing in front of the vehicle pulls his weapon and fires into the windshield. He lurches back as the car turns away from him. The officer, by then very close to the open window on the driver's side, fires two more times, fatally shooting Renee Good, according to an analysis of the videos by the Associated Press and others.

Federal officials at the time said the officer acted in self-defense and that Good had engaged in “an act of domestic terrorism.”

Becca and Renee Good were not legally married, according to a family lawyer, but referred to one another as wives.

“I don't hate the people that took Renee from us,” Becca Good said. “But what I want them to understand: Every single day they get to look at their children and their wives and their sisters and know what they took from our family. They took a mother away from her children. They know that. And they will carry it forever.”

The wrongful death lawsuit against the US government seeks damages for “the immense suffering” Good endured in her final moments and her family's “profound and permanent” loss.

The other lawsuit, against Ross and top federal immigration officials, paints Operation Metro Surge as a conspiracy to trample the civil rights of immigrants, and accuses the administration of targeting Becca instead of thoroughly investigating Good's killing.

Judge nixes charge of Olympian

POLITICAL NOTEBOOK

Olympian David Hearn over alleged vandalism of the Lincoln Memorial Reflecting Pool, a judge in Washington said Thursday, finding that President Trump had tried to influence the case.

Judge Todd E. Edelman of the Superior Court in Washington agreed with Hearn's lawyers that the case should be dismissed with prejudice, barring prosecutors from bringing it back in the future.

US Attorney Jeanine Pirro had already dropped the charges on July 31, admitting that damage to the pool was the result of botched renovations, rather than sabotage, as officials had originally alleged.

But Trump complained on social media about Pirro's decision, saying she had “made a mistake” and “choked” because “the judge was really vicious.” Those and other comments prompted Hearn's lawyers to file a motion to ensure that the charge couldn't be revived.

“While all defendants deal with some degree of uncertainty regarding the odds of reprosecution after a case has been dismissed,” Edelman wrote, “Mr. Hearn faces the unique possibility that the government will revive this case — one that it has already announced to be meritless — based on political pressure brought by the president of the United States upon his subordinate officers.”

“The court agrees with the defense that in securing the indictment against Mr. Hearn, the government shot first and asked questions later,” he added. “Nothing about the grand jury process would prevent it from giving in to the president's pressure and doing so again.”

Hearn's lawyers, Norm Eisen, Mary Dohrmann and Steve Levin, said in a statement that the ruling was “a victory for the rule of law and for an innocent American seeking justice.”

“This case never should have been brought in the first place,” they said. “This was a miscarriage of justice, and what happened to Davey is an outrage that should shock every American.”

A spokesperson for the US attorney's office did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

States, cities sue over Trump's EPA eliminating rule

WASHINGTON — States and cities sued the Trump administration Thursday for repealing rules that limit planet-warming greenhouse gas emissions from power plants fueled by coal and natural gas.

Twenty-one states, led by New York and including Massachusetts, are challenging the Environmental Protection Agency's power plant rule. The coalition also includes Pennsylvania's governor, the District of Columbia, New York City, Chicago, and the city and county of Denver. They argue that “gutting one of the country's most significant climate protections” will set the nation back decades and worsen the climate crisis.

The EPA announced last month it's revoking the Biden-era rule, and said it is taking a separate but related step to prevent future administrations from regulating climate pollution from power plants.

New York Attorney General Letitia James said the federal government is showing “callous disregard” for Americans' health and the environment, and future generations will pay the price.

“Dismantling these protections is a betrayal of American families, and the stakes are too high to allow this administration to once again put profits over people,” James said in a statement Thursday.

Poll shows most Americans blame Trump for high prices

WASHINGTON — Americans are deeply frustrated with President Trump's handling of the economy and rising prices, with most panning his performance and blaming his policies as higher costs threaten his party's chances in November.

A new poll from the Associated Press-NORC Center for Public Affairs Research finds that only 17 percent of US adults approve of the Republican president's handling of the cost of living. Just 26 percent approve of his handling of the economy overall, marking a new low.

A majority, 65 percent, of US adults now blame Trump's policies for persistently high costs more than factors outside of his control, signaling growing weariness over his aggressive use of tariffs and continued unhappiness with the war with Iran.

The dismal numbers come just weeks before midterm elections that will determine whether Republicans maintain control of Congress and while Trump is hitting the campaign trail with an aggressive schedule of rallies. But Trump — who has asked voters to pretend that he is on the ballot as he tries to bolster turnout — remains deeply unpopular, with even many Republicans faulting him for failing to deliver on promised relief.

“I was hoping it would be better or different, but it's not really good,” said Robert Gault, 66, a retired factory worker from Bradford, Pa., who describes himself as a Republican.

“Our president, I thought, was going to help the country, and so far he has not really seemed to have done that with the economy or in general. He's not really done what I was hoping he would,” Gault said. “He said, ‘Make America Great Again.’ And I have not seen him do that.”

strengthen efforts to keep children safe.”

In her report, which investigated sexual abuse in the Fall River and Springfield dioceses, Campbell took particular aim at the continued refusal by the Worcester Diocese to disclose the identities of its accused priests.

“We asked each sexual abuse survivor what changes they would like to see the dioceses implement in the future,” the report stated. “All survivors from the Worcester Diocese named a credibly accused list as their No. 1 request from the diocese.”

Although the US Conference of Catholic Bishops in 2002 adopted a charter that called “for openness and transparency, Worcester has refused an open and transparent practice, which is in place in every other diocese in Massachusetts,” the report said.

In his defense, McManus has said the Vatican opposes publishing lists unless the clergy who are named have been found guilty of a canonical crime. However, most American bishops do share them in an effort to rebuild trust and repair the enormous damage from the clergy sex-abuse scandal.

In a diocesan report from 2023, McManus wrote that releasing the names “can be a cause for deep division among many members of our church.”

Many Catholics, he said then, are concerned about “publicly branding as guilty those who never have been charged by law enforcement or had a chance to defend themselves in a court of law,” due to death or the passage of many decades.

But for watchdog groups such as BishopAccountability.org, a Waltham-based advocacy group, releasing the names of all credibly accused priests — active, retired, or deceased — is a long-overdue effort to increase transparency and hold offending priests and their superiors responsible.

“McManus has been very clear he does not intend to do it,” said Terence McKiernan, codirector of Bishop.Accountability.org. “They have fought tooth and nail, and it’s a very locked-down and inhospitable diocese to survivors.”

McManus, who is required by the Vatican to submit a letter of resignation at age 75, has developed a reputation as an old-school conservative since becoming bishop in 2004.

In 2022, he directed a Jesuit middle school in Worcester to remove Pride and Black Lives Matter flags, which had been displayed there for more than a year. And in 2012, he voiced his displeasure when Vicki Kennedy, the pro-choice widow of Senator Edward M. Kennedy, was chosen as commencement speaker at Anna Maria College in Paxton. The college then withdrew the invitation.

“Worcester has been in this kind of vacuum where there’s been no pressure in the past to be accountable, to be transparent. McManus is almost singular in how much he has suppressed,” said Anne Barrett Doyle, another codirector of BishopAccountability.org.

Among the examples cited in Campbell’s report is that of Worcester priest Brendan O’Donoghue, who had been transferred 12 times between 1950 to 1965 by two bishops with knowledge of the allegations against him, the report said.

“Following several more transfers and additional sexual abuse of children, O’Donoghue spent time at the House of Affirmation but continued in ministry until his retirement in 1993,” according to the report, citing his stay at rehabilitation home for clergy in Whitinsville.

In another example, a priest in the diocese reported allegations of abuse by another priest to his superiors. In response, a senior diocesan official said he would resolve the issue by taking the accused priest on a fishing trip and talking to him.

The report said victims described interviews with diocesan officials that were conducted over the telephone, and without the opportunity to meet with the diocese’s Victim Assistance Coordinator or members of the Review Committee in person.

Delisle, the Worcester spokesperson, said the diocese welcomes the attorney general’s report, noting that the “vast majority of cases occurred 40 to 60 years ago.”

Delisle said that the diocese has passed a compliance audit each year since adopting the 2002 Charter for the Protection of Children and Minors, which had been approved by the US bishops in Dallas.

Still, some critics remain unconvinced that the diocese is doing enough.

The names should be released, said Lewcon, the abuse survivor, for transparency’s sake and “to validate other victims. I feel the intimidation we’ve experienced has prevented others from coming forward.”

A small measure to put the state’s energy future into words

It is emerging as a sticking point in conference-committee negotiations between the House and Senate — and is emblematic of the ongoing debate over how much of a role natural gas should play in our energy mix.

As Representative Mark Cusack and Senator Mike Barrett begin their negotiations, the sides seem far apart. The two co-chairs of the Legislature’s energy committee know there are many other differences between the House and Senate bills, legislation ostensibly aimed at “energy affordability.” Most notably, the House would pare back the Mass Save home-efficiency program, while the Senate’s version phases out a pricey gas-pipe replacement initiative known as GSEP.

The language addressing utilities’ obligation to serve is tucked into the Senate’s GSEP section. Essentially, if a utility determines a gas pipe needs replacing for a particular neighborhood, and most homeowners want to convert to electric heat, the state Department of Utilities could force the holdouts to convert, too, instead of passing the costs of pipe upgrades on to ratepayers. (The Senate bill doesn’t spell out how many volunteer conversions would be needed.)

The business community is sounding the alarm. Jon Hurst, head of the Retailers Association of Massachusetts, says having no energy bill at all is a better outcome than passing the Senate’s, given the anger from consumers and small businesses about utility bills lately. The “Big Four” — Mass. Business Roundtable, Greater Boston Chamber, Associated Industries of Massachusetts, and Mass. Taxpayers Foundation — told conferees that the language eliminates customer choice while forcing ratepayers to accept a different energy source (electricity) that also faces supply constraints.

As Bill Ryan, spokesman for the business group-funded Mass Coalition for Sustainable Energy, puts it: “This is a ‘tip of the iceberg’ type of thing” toward ending natural gas service in Massachusetts. His group estimates billions in added costs over time, for everything from furnace replacements to electrical upgrades.

While natural gas plants still provide much of our electricity, environmental groups argue that it’s time to get more serious about moving off fossil fuels. State law, after all, requires carbon emissions to be all but eliminated by 2050.

At Environmental League of Massachusetts, Amy Boyd Rabin says inaction on this issue will only increase utility profits amid overspending on antiquated gas networks, without providing necessary rate relief.

And the Conservation Law Foundation’s Caitlin Peale Sloan called the warnings from business groups “a self-serving story peddled by the utilities” to defend a program that pads their profits at the expense of families and businesses exposed to volatile fossil fuel prices.

The Legislature’s most recent energy law, passed in 2024, includes language that allows the DPU to consider greenhouse gas emissions as a reason for rejecting a petition for natural gas supply, if electricity is available for heat instead. However, utilities argued they still have an obligation to serve existing gas customers, even if that law prevents service for future ones.

Barrett says the Senate’s new language doesn’t represent the end of natural gas delivery as we know it, despite the doomsday scenarios being presented by who he calls “apologists for fossil fuels.” Instead, it’s an attempt to provide flexibility for neighborhoods in which most, but not all, residents want to make the switch to electric. Without this language, Barrett says the holdouts could result in ratepayers supporting electric-system upgrades and pipe replacements for a dwindling number of gas customers, making the energy system more expensive for everyone.

Better state law is needed, he adds, to allow communities to selectively decommission sections of their gas networks. That’s why, he says, the Senate supports this clarifying language. In the end, the DPU would still have the final say in determining whether affected customers have access to an affordable alternative.

If a utility determines a gas pipe needs replacing for a particular neighborhood, and most homeowners want to convert to electric heat, the state could force the holdouts to convert.

Sure, this is a contentious issue. But Barrett says the main debate is around the pace at which we transition off fossil fuels, not about the fundamental need to do so eventually. Some communities want to move faster than others. The question, Barrett says, they face isn’t whether a utility can force a particular customer off gas, but whether that customer can hold out and force everyone else to help pay for maintaining the pipes.

The environmental advocates see this as a small but helpful step toward moving more people to cleaner forms of energy. The business lobbyists, though, see one more piece of legislation to chip away at access to natural gas — and a potentially expensive one at that.

Resolving that conflict won’t be easy. But it could be crucial to getting the Legislature’s latest energy bill over the finish line.

This overhaul, the latest of several attempts to improve traffic and bus travel on Blue Hill Avenue, has the potential to redefine the avenue by spurring more development and attracting new visitors to an area that has long been stigmatized as rundown and unsafe. At the same time, tension is building over who will benefit.

If construction keeps customers away, or the area becomes more expensive, small-business owners of color could be priced out of one of the few affordable commercial areas in the city. And, some local entrepreneurs fear, they could be replaced by wealthier, whiter enterprises.

A refreshed Blue Hill Avenue would increase property values for people like Warren and her family, who still own the house in Mattapan, but many of the commercial real estate owners who stand to benefit from the multimillion-dollar makeover are far less invested in preserving the authenticity and local flavor of the neighborhood. Some of those owners inherited paid-off properties and live elsewhere, while others scooped up neglected space for a song and are just waiting to cash in. A number of storefronts sit empty.

Even though the latest plan for Blue Hill Avenue would increase parking in some places, disruption during a years-long construction process could keep customers away, putting a strain on the businesses there. And even though the upgrade would likely raise property values, it could also increase taxes for building owners, which could cause them to jack up the rent or sell to the highest bidder. This could have a domino effect: closing down some of the more than 1,100 establishments — some barely hanging on, almost all locally owned — located in the census tracts along the 3-mile stretch slated for redevelopment, and opening the door to more profitable corporate chains.

Blue Hill Avenue is the most important corridor in the city for Black Bostonians, said Fatima Ali-Salaam, president of the Greater Mattapan Neighborhood Council. With the right support and investment, she said, it could become the “Black Wall Street” of Boston.

The city stands to gain from increased tax revenues generated along the refurbished corridor, but it doesn’t conduct economic impact studies before projects. So it’s unclear: Will it generate jobs, or destroy them? Will it increase sales? Drive up prices? Depending on what happens, the diversity and strong local connections that are essential to Blue Hill Avenue’s character could be at risk.

Sami Salameh, who opened Salameh Jewelry in Mattapan Square 30 years ago with his father, a Palestinian tailor, once kept a gold chain and bracelet on layaway for 13 years for a customer who went to prison — and let him purchase it for close to the original price when he got out. A few years ago, Danielle Johnson moved her digital radio station Spark FM from Hyde Park to a second-floor space overlooking Blue Hill Avenue: “Location, location, location,” she said. It makes sense, she said, for a Black media company that broadcasts the community’s concerns about the redevelopment’s proposed center-running bus lane to be based in the middle of the Black community.

But with the rent rising steadily, Johnson is already looking for a new home, and trying to save up to buy a space, preferably before the redevelopment drives prices even higher. “We’re going to be displaced in droves,” she said.

In one of the last affordable areas of the city, largely populated by immigrants and people of color, the overarching worry is not about the bus lane. It’s about being pushed out.

the area, and in just a few years’ time, a majority-Jewish area became a majority-Black one. But by 1974, more than half the people who took advantage of those loans, many of which didn’t require down payments or thorough home inspections, had lost their houses. And the formerly thriving Blue Hill Avenue has never been the same.

Today, parts of the corridor remain rundown, with boarded-up shops and long-vacant storefronts dotting the street alongside numerous corner markets, tire shops, and churches.

For Warren, the ability to bring her educational nonprofit and Sadiddy Lifestyle Beauty Studio to her childhood neighborhood goes beyond her entrepreneurial dreams. The three-building complex on formerly vacant city-owned land, called Blume on the Ave, is being built by an affordable housing developer who also grew up in the area. Condos are being sold at below-market rates, and ground-floor commercial spaces sold at cost, to promote local ownership.

“When we talk about ‘buying back the block’ and we talk about ensuring generational wealth in our communities, that’s what this project is,” said Warren, who has held fund-raisers and applied for loans at three banks to secure funding for her retail space.

Getting loans can be challenging for entrepreneurs of color if they don’t have the right connections or access to capital, said Dariela Villon-Maga, the Blume on the Ave developer, who grew up in Roxbury and lives in Mattapan. Black- and Latino-owned small businesses with low credit risk are less than half as likely to be fully approved for financing as white-owned ones, according to a 2021 survey by the Federal Reserve Banks.

Villon-Maga is one of a number of local professionals, many from immigrant families, who have started investing in their communities before corporate developers start to circle.

Ernst Guerrier, the child of a Haitian cab driver and housekeeper in Mattapan, recently bought his second commercial property in Mattapan Square and hopes to put a restaurant and eight condos on the ground floor. Guerrier’s first job was in the first building he bought, at a fish market still in operation, and he has plans to add 110 units of housing above it. That property also has the square’s only sit-down restaurant, Marabou Cafe, which was just approved for a liquor license.

JONATHAN WIGGS/GLOBE STAFF

Guerrier, a 57-year-old real estate lawyer, said his tenants’ leases all include the right to make the first offer if he decides to sell.

“It’s a quiet storm,” he said of local efforts to improve the area. “Within 10 years, I guarantee it, you won’t even recognize Mattapan Square.”

But costs for property owners stand to increase, as building values — and taxes — rise. And that could be an issue for lower-income landlords with rundown buildings in need of repair. Raising the rent or selling the building could force local businesses out — and invite corporate chains in.

Raising prices isn’t a good option either. Of the more than 45,000 residents living in the census tracts along the avenue, 65 percent are Black and 23 percent are Latino; almost half were born in another country. And nearly 40 percent of households make less than $40,000 a year.

“This is a very economically vulnerable part of the city,” said James Jennings, a professor emeritus at Tufts University who has studied the redevelopment area.

A number of mom-and-pop enterprises along the avenue conduct some business in cash and don’t report it, according to members of the business community. This eases their tax burden but also keeps their total profits off the books, which can make it harder to get loans, and also means they might not qualify for grants like the ones offered during the pandemic. Some of these businesses don’t have lawyers or insurance; some don’t even have leases.

As with houses, commercial buildings in Black communities are often undervalued. Commercial real estate in majority-Black ZIP codes is valued 7 percent lower than comparable properties in areas with fewer Black residents, according to Brookings Institution research. This means building owners are getting less rental income than they could elsewhere and leaves these neighborhoods vulnerable to exploitation by investors who buy properties and use the depreciation as a tax break, opening them up to neglect.

In Roxbury and Dorchester, retail properties are worth $2.8 million each, on average — 43 percent less than in Allston/Brighton and 10 percent less than in the South End, according to the commercial real estate analytics platform CoStar.

The city has awarded grants to more than a dozen businesses on the corridor in recent years, said Mayor Michelle Wu, and a fund is in the works to help mitigate revenue lost during construction. The city, state, and MBTA are “ready to do what’s needed to ensure that our small businesses will be protected,” she said.

“Blue Hill Ave. is a key economic corridor for the city,” she said. “There are so many storefronts and important community hubs along the roadway.”

But promises to refurbish it have been made, and broken, for decades. Many locals feel the revitalization project isn’t for them — it’s for the wealthy white people on their way.

The redevelopment is a “form of trauma,” said Derick Foster-Toney, whose family has run the historic roller skating rink Chez-Vous for more than 50 years and bought the building in the mid-’90s.

The community has been so marginalized, Foster said, it’s hard to believe anyone has its best interests in mind.

“When you’re operating in survival mode for so long,” he said, “who do you really trust to save you?”

* * *

One of the biggest property owners on Blue Hill Avenue is the Stamatos family, which owns dozens of residential and commercial buildings around Boston and recently purchased the former Kay’s Oasis function hall — just around the corner from the home where Warren’s 94-year-old grandmother lives.

Some of their properties are tidy and well-kept, but others are dilapidated, with chipped paint, crumbling bricks and trash-strewn lots. The first four of 14 buildings on the city’s “problem properties” list are Stamatos-owned — for repeated calls to the police about noise, late-night parties, and poor conditions.

In 2009, on the tail end of the financial crisis, they had purchased more foreclosed housing units than any other buyer in Boston, according to news reports. They have tried to impose huge rent hikes at a newly purchased apartment building in Mattapan, been hit with violations for serving alcohol to underage customers in Roxbury, and been sued by a man who was shot in one of their buildings in Mattapan Square.

A number of Stamatos properties have been cited for code violations involving mice and roach infestations, water leaks, faulty smoke detectors, and unsecured fire escapes. They also owe more than $700,000 in property taxes and fines.

One neighborhood advocate referred to the family as “extractorionists” — and despite their neglect and disregard for tenants, they stand to see their investments pay off handsomely as Blue Hill Avenue improves.

Family members and Stamatos Property Management in Jamaica Plain did not respond to requests for comment.

The city can levy fines, withhold permits, and put problematic properties in receivership, but has little oversight over private real estate transactions.

Small business owners have fewer rights than residential tenants do, said Boston College law professor Carlos Teuscher. Commercial building owners know tenants are unlikely to leave once their businesses are established, which gives landlords little incentive to maintain the property. And they can raise the rent as much as they want when a lease is up. Many noncorporate landlords don’t even bother with leases, Teuscher said, leaving tenants unprotected.

“Commercial tenants are assumed to be sophisticated business entities, so there’s very few legal protections,” Teuscher said. “Generally speaking, if it’s not in your lease, tough luck.”

Teuscher surveyed Somerville business owners before the Green Line extension to Union Square in 2022 and found that many landlords had stopped making repairs or offering leases, making it easier to sell or find tenants willing to pay more.

A number of protections can be put in place to help Blue Hill Avenue businesses survive, and thrive, beyond the redevelopment.

The city could institute formal agreements with developers requiring that ground-floor retail space be occupied by local businesses, a share of commercial space be sold at affordable rates, and a percentage of contracts and construction jobs go toward area residents, including apprenticeships that will build new skills, said Jennings, the Tufts urban planning professor. The city can also commit to contracting goods and services from local vendors.

Different types of businesses also have to be accounted for, he said, including the roughly 50 stores along the corridor that accept SNAP payments from low-income residents.

These plans need to be drafted with community input, committed to on paper, and measured and monitored along the way to ensure their success, Jennings said.

“The city has a lot of power, direct and indirect, to say, this is the kind of vision we have for this community, based on community input and community residents, and this is what we need to do,” he said.

Supporting ground-floor retail will be a priority during the zoning process, Wu said, and the city is looking for resources to continue its program to help residents buy commercial space. Community feedback has been part of the process all along, according to the city, which is working with the MBTA to understand businesses’ needs during construction and beyond.

This type of support will go a long way toward winning over the business community, said Denise O’Marde, who owns the smoothie shop Cafe JuiceUp. O’Marde, who bought the building as it was being foreclosed on in 2007, worries that, without assistance, revenue could plummet during construction and she’d be forced to lay off employees, leading to higher unemployment taxes.

Now that there’s a fund dedicated to helping small businesses during the redevelopment, O’Marde said, she supports the redevelopment.

Without help, she said: “We could definitely go under.”

Ursula Vaughn, co-owner of Lawson’s Hair Salon, has already lived through the construction of the Columbus Avenue center bus lane in front of her shop in Egleston Square about five years ago — a process that took away parking and dropped traffic to one lane each way. Now she’s gearing up for a similar disruption at her shop in Mattapan Square, part of a chain started by her father and his brothers in the 1960s.

More than anything, though, Vaughn wants to preserve the cultural and social diversity of Blue Hill Avenue. A number of local business owners said they don’t want to see the corridor turn into the Seaport; they want to maintain its soul, in other words.

A politician who lives in the area told Vaughn: “Mattapan will be a destination.” But attracting visitors shouldn’t be the selling point, she pushed back.

So many Black and brown residents are already leaving the city for less expensive suburbs, she noted. This project, in the heart of Black Boston, could force even more out.

Take the money, Healey

At a time when public schools are struggling with teacher layoffs and program cuts, a new pot of money could become available next year to boost public and private education in Massachusetts — if Governor Maura Healey agrees to take it.

The federal government on Thursday released long-awaited regulations governing the new Federal Scholarship Tax Credit. The program is controversial because it is, effectively, a backdoor voucher program that lets public money subsidize private school tuition.

But, importantly, it also lets the same pot of money improve public schools — paying for technology, afterschool programs, tutoring, and special needs services.

Healey should take the money. Although she has until Jan. 1 to make Massachusetts eligible for the funding in 2027, Healey should opt in soon. That will give her time to use her bully pulpit and state resources to shape the program to have the biggest possible positive impact on public schools that need it most.

Under the program, taxpayers can donate to a nonprofit scholarship granting organization of their choice and get a federal income tax credit up to $1,700 to match their donation. So an individual giving $1,700 or married couple giving $3,400 effectively donates for free.

The scholarship granting organization can give scholarship money to any student whose family earns less than 300 percent of area median income ($500,000 for a family of four in the Boston area). Foster children and children receiving public benefits are categorically eligible without having to prove their income.

To help lower-income districts, schools drawing primarily from low-income census tracts — including parts of Boston, Lawrence, Springfield, Chelsea, and other poorer cities — can use the money to pay for tutoring and special education for all students, without verifying individual family incomes.

For private and parochial schools, this money could provide financial aid for tuition. For public schools, it could cover things like books, supplies, computers, tutoring, or afterschool activities. (The federal government plans to release additional information about eligible expenses.) The size of scholarships will be up to the scholarship granting organizations.

How much money Massachusetts schools would get depends on how many people donate. The American Federation for Children's calculator estimates that if 10 percent of eligible Massachusetts taxpayers (around 290,000 people) give to scholarship granting organizations operating in Massachusetts, that would amount to $459 million in 2027. How much goes to public versus private schools would depend on which scholarship granting organizations taxpayers donate to.

While states must submit lists of approved scholarship granting organizations to the federal government, states may not add their own requirements — for example, requiring an organization to only fund scholarships at public schools.

One concern critics have is the program could disproportionately benefit wealthier districts and private schools. After all, private schools with wealthy alumni networks or public school districts with tax-savvy, high-earning parents will be easier to solicit donations from.

That's why it will be important for nonprofits and school districts serving low-income students to create scholarship granting organizations and find creative ways to fund them — like allowing employees to contribute through payroll tax deductions or partnering with local employers to solicit employee contributions. Healey and other state leaders could fund-raise for scholarship granting organizations that benefit programs in needy districts.

Another valid concern is that if increased availability of financial aid makes private education more affordable, some students may leave public schools for private schools. Jon Valant, director of the Brown Center on Education Policy at Brookings, told the editorial board he worries this will lead to a more stratified education system where “the ‘haves’ end up in private schools, the ‘have nots’ in public schools.”

Enrollment in Massachusetts public schools is already declining for reasons ranging from demographic shifts to federal immigration policy to dissatisfaction with COVID-era practices. As schools lose students, they lose the state money that comes with each student.

Private school tuition is expensive, and certainly, added financial aid could make a difference to middle-class families on the margins of being able to afford it. But declining enrollment also points to a need to use all available money — including the new scholarships — to improve the quality of public schools, so parents want to keep their children there.

So far, 30 states, though only a handful with Democratic governors, have opted into the program.

If Massachusetts opts out, some taxpayers will still contribute money, but that money will flow out of state. Opting in is the only way to keep potentially hundreds of millions of dollars earmarked for education in Massachusetts. Our schools — private and public — could use that money.

A lively time at the death cafe

By Renée Loth

Renée Loth is a contributing Globe Opinion writer.

We gathered on a bright fall evening at the Mount Auburn Cemetery to sip tea, eat cupcakes, and talk with complete strangers about society's ultimate taboo.

For about two hours, some 40 people sitting below the dark wooden beams of Mount Auburn's Story Chapel dared to ask the big questions: What scares you most about dying? What would you like done with your body after you die? We talked about death as the ultimate loss of control, the search for ways to confront dying beyond organized religion, and how to approach our deaths without regret. And the cupcakes were delicious.

This is a death cafe, an increasingly popular forum where people gather to discuss — and perhaps demystify — this most universal truth. “We are on the cusp of a significant change in how we talk about death and dying,” Bree Harvey, Mount Auburn's vice-president of cemetery and visitor services, said in an interview. “I feel it's in the ether.”

Like many in my age cohort, now passing 70, death has been much with me lately; the circle of those close to me who are falling ill or dying tightens seemingly every month. Even the death of famous figures — Dolly Parton, Wendell Berry, Gloria Steinem — seem to touch me more, because their lives and times were nearly in tandem with my own. Mortality feels very alive when you get to my age.

Which is why I was so surprised that everyone at my table was under 40.

One young man, 24, spoke about his father's unexpected death. “I didn't feel I had the right to cry,” he said. “Mom did all the grieving instead.” A woman in her 20s described having a sister who died years before she herself was born. “I feel like it was a kind of soft launch to grief,” she said. But despite carrying the knowledge of death's caprice in her core, she couldn't fathom her own end. “I can't sit with the idea that I won't be able to talk or think.” (The participants knew I was a journalist and agreed to be quoted without their names.)

Although there were plenty of gray hairs in attendance as well, the evening's facilitator wasn't surprised by Gen Z's participation. “It's become a fashionable conversation to have,” said Corinne Elicona, 31, Mount Auburn's end of life educator, who began hosting death cafes in her dorm more than 10 years ago. The climate crisis, artificial intelligence, and the staggering pace of change compel young people to address the greatest unknown of them all, she said. “You think about your existence in a way older generations did not at the same age.”

Death cafes aren't new; Mount Auburn has been hosting them twice a year, on the equinox, for about a decade. But their popularity is spiking as part of a larger movement to reimagine death — including the growing acceptance of medical aid in dying, natural burial, and end-of-life doulas who guide their clients through the process with emotional and spiritual support. Swiss anthropologist Bernard Crettaz hosted the first cafes mortels in 2004, aiming to break what he called the “tyrannical secrecy” surrounding death. In just a few decades the idea has taken off. Death cafes are scheduled in Winthrop, Weymouth, and Martha's Vineyard this month.

Some set a winking tone, with coffin-shaped cookies or skull cakes. Some are more somber affairs, though they are not formal bereavement groups. Anyone can facilitate; hosts need not be certified in anything but empathy. The team at Mount Auburn believes young people are attracted to a forum that lets them take some measure of agency over an experience deeply bound by societal strictures. The same could be said about baby boomers, looking to put an alternative stamp on death, just as they have with every other life passage.

“We haven't had this level of disruption in the funeral industry since cremation came in, in the late 1800s,” Harvey said. Indeed, before the advent of commercial funerals, most families laid out their dead at home, in the parlor. When that started to change in the early 20th century, the term “living room” was coined.

One paradox I noticed that evening at Mount Auburn is that every person's experience with death is uniquely theirs, and yet, of course, it happens to everyone. Roughly 63 million people worldwide will die this year. This universality could help us remember that we are all part of nature, and few things are more natural than death. There may be some comfort in that.

When I left the Story Chapel it was dusk; the cicadas were sawing away, and the stately Mount Auburn memorials were in silent silhouette. Far from being down after two hours discussing death, I felt lighter, more than ever in love with life.

Dartmouth provost in a real bind over use of artificial intelligence

Before reputations are harmed, we should be clear on what AI-detection tools actually measure

The Globe's reporting on Dartmouth's provost and the use of artificial intelligence in his academic writing highlights a growing misunderstanding about what AI-detection tools actually measure ("Provost's use of AI angers campus: Dartmouth leader relied heavily on tool, review says," Page A1, Sept. 26). These tools do not determine who wrote a text or whether its ideas were generated by a machine. Rather, they compare the writing to statistical patterns found in modern academic prose, which is now routinely edited with AI-assisted tools such as Grammarly or language models used for grammar and flow refinement.

As scientific writing has become more standardized and syntactically polished, it increasingly resembles the stylistic profile that AI systems produce. Ironically, the clearer and more coherent the prose, the more likely detectors are to flag it as "AI-generated." A scholar who writes his own papers and uses AI only to check syntax or logical flow may therefore be misidentified as having outsourced authorship, even when the intellectual work is entirely his or her own.

Academic integrity is essential. But resemblance in style is not evidence of misconduct. Before reputations are damaged, the public deserves a more accurate understanding of what AI detectors can and cannot tell us.

Provost and college president talk around the problem

The details about Dartmouth College's provost, Santiago Schnell, and his use of artificial intelligence in his writing are appalling. I am sick of people who have done wrong saying things like, "I am sorry that this was not my standard practice," as Schnell did, saying, "I now realize I should always explicitly disclose use of AI in my public writing."

The response from Sian Leah Beilock, president of Dartmouth, was mealy-mouthed: "The questions this moment raise go well beyond any one person. Thoughtful people on our campus can and should disagree about those norms, which are rapidly shifting."

What the college's provost has done is wrong. Someone needs to say so. Since AI won't say so, and since the president of Dartmouth won't say so, I will.

MCAS woes and funding gaps persist for Mass. public schools

As a school committee member in a Gateway City, I have two reactions to the disappointment that's been expressed over recent MCAS results ("Big hike in funds, modest returns: State boosted aid to needy schools but gaps persist," Page A1, Sept. 29).

First, Massachusetts public schools are not yet seeing the full effect of the 2019 Student Opportunity Act as designed. This is the first year schools have reached the final targeted funding, and the effects of added funding are still working their way through low-income districts. Moreover, under current law, school districts will never see the level of "foundation budgets" and state aid intended when the act was passed. That's because annual inflation adjustments are capped at 4.5 percent. To date this cap has cumulatively reduced foundation budgets — which establish a minimum foundational level of funding for each school district — by 6 percent. School purchasing power will further erode this year and every year when inflation, as measured for the state's Foundation Inflation Index, exceeds 4.5 percent.

Second, changes are needed in the way the state implements its tiered system for matching educational resources with individual student needs. We will never get the majority of our students meeting expectations on MCAS if we focus too narrowly on the smallest tiers with the highest-need students. Improving district-level MCAS results requires effectively engaging mainstream students.

All of our students can receive the level of education Massachusetts defines as "foundational" if we stay the course on reforms that work, such as early literacy instruction; focus on instructional strategies that engage every student; and remove the cap and restore funding levels to fully reflect recent and future inflation.

The Red Sox had great chemistry ... till their stars returned

I'm sure there will be a lot of opinions about why the Boston Red Sox ended their season on such a dismal note. I'm also sure all have some merit. The change in the team that I noted was when the two purported superstars, Roman Anthony and Trevor Story, returned at the end of August.

Prior to that, the team had great chemistry and enjoyed playing the game and competing together. You could feel the energy, even if you weren't that familiar with some of the players' names.

After the stars' return, it was as if the Peanuts character Pig-Pen had gifted his cloud to the team. The smiles were gone, the energy was gone, and arguably, the Red Sox' hopes for the postseason were gone.

Wu's bold White Stadium plan hasn't convinced everyone

With a recent Supreme Judicial Court ruling, Mayor Michelle Wu won the legal battle over an ambitious plan to renovate White Stadium in partnership with a professional women's soccer team. But the battle for the hearts and minds of those who live in adjacent neighborhoods is not over — and, for once, Wu sounds like she knows it.

Since the SJC decision, city officials have been hosting a series of community meetings to explain how the city plans to get fans in and out of the stadium with minimum neighborhood disruption.

At the most recent meeting at Boston English High School, some of the roughly 100 attendees said they are excited about the new facility. But tough questions remained about parking and traffic, as well as anger over what some still see as wrongful use of public land — no matter how much the private entity is paying. Based on several conversations following the meeting, it seemed clear that those who didn't like the project from the start didn't leave the meeting any more convinced.

Asked if she had a message for those constituents, Wu told me in an interview, "We are going to keep at it with everyone who is part of our community."

One of the most heated discussions surrounds the lack of designated stadium parking. Game attendees are expected to walk, bike, or use shuttle buses from remote parking sites and MBTA stations, with 124 total bus trips projected for each of up to 20 games per season. When fans buy a ticket on the website, they have to choose which transportation option they'll use. How many will actually stick with that choice, rather than take their chances on finding a parking spot somewhere near the stadium, is unknown.

A so-called parking protection program gives residents within a 0.75-mile radius of the stadium the choice of opting in or out of game-day parking bans. If they opt in to parking bans, residents will be issued a placard for every car registered to that address, plus two visitor passes. If they opt out of a parking ban, neighborhoods will be open parking for all.

According to the city's presentation package, neighborhood associations covering the streets within the stadium zone will offer recommendations on parking protection implementation. Residents will be informed about the process through fliers and directed to a survey on a city website about the White Stadium project.

Tough questions remain about parking and traffic, as well as anger over what some still see as wrongful use of public land — no matter how much the private entity is paying.

Wu told me that any parking decisions made now are not final. The goal is to let residents drive the decision.

At the English High meeting, Alcurtis Clark, chair of the Jamaica Plain Neighborhood Council, told city officials that she found the survey hard to find — and she has a point. In an interview after the meeting, Clark also told me, "I am not opposed to change. ... I'm opposed to the way this project was forced down our throats." The parking plan "really knocked me for a loop," she said, because residents are just now learning which streets are affected and which are not.

Clark recounted that as she was leaving the meeting, she told another attendee, "Am I crazy to keep talking and trying to understand the process?" He replied, "You're crazy if you think they heard you."

If people still feel they aren't been heard, that's a problem.

When I asked Wu if she would do anything differently when it comes to community engagement, she said, "If I could have a magic wand that could change anything in the world, it would have been more time to engage everyone in the early stages of the project." However, the window between the league's announcement about a new soccer team and the deadline for submitting plans for it was short. As a result, she said, "The project was forced to move a lot faster than it otherwise would have."

That explains some, but not all of the reasons why people felt locked out of her decision-making on this project. A piece in Commonwealth Beacon also notes a "community engagement gap," which the piece attributes to Wu's decision to bypass a more rigorous community review process that applies to most large infrastructure proposals, but not White Stadium.

Wu has said before that she believes in taking big swings. This, she acknowledged, "is a particularly contentious one. That's because our community has lots of different perspectives" and "is not shy" about expressing them. She still sees this as a big swing that will end up providing the city's student athletes with access to "the best public school athletic facility in the country."

Some skeptics will have to see it to believe it.

Meanwhile, are the legal battles really over?

In an interview, Louis Elisa, a member of the Franklin Park Defenders, the named plaintiffs who challenged the White Stadium plan, called the traffic plan update sessions "a dog and pony show" and told me that even with the SJC decision, he does not consider the outcome "a done deal." Elisa, who is also president of the Garrison Trotter Neighborhood Association, said there is talk about filing a lawsuit on the basis of environmental justice challenges.

It seems like Wu should do all the listening and bridge-building that is necessary to avoid that outcome.

The Supreme Court puts cruelty on its docket

The cruelty is the point. That phrase, coined by The Atlantic's Adam Serwer during President Trump's first term to describe his administration's penchant for making marginalized people suffer in order to please his populist base, still rings painfully true. Nothing has made that clearer than the president's draconian immigration enforcement policies that harm citizens and noncitizens alike by tearing families apart; sowing terror in schools, churches, and hospitals; and militarizing border crossings.

These practices have not been carried out merely in the interest of enforcements go to Mexico, a growing number of people are being sent to central Africa, where leaders have entered into often lucrative contracts with the US government to accept noncitizen immigrants. And frequently those destinations, including the Central African Republic, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Libya, South Sudan, and Uganda, are designated by the US State Department to be too dangerous for Americans to even visit, let alone be forced to live.

Lawyers from some of the migrants report that they have been subject to brutality upon arrival to these countries. Attorneys for Eritrean and Egyptians go to Mexico, a growing number of people are being sent to central Africa, where leaders have entered into often lucrative contracts with the US government to accept noncitizen immigrants. And frequently those destinations, including the Central African Republic, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Libya, South Sudan, and Uganda, are designated by the US State Department to be too dangerous for Americans to even visit, let alone be forced to live.

But just days later, the Supreme Court eliminated that protection. Justices Sonia Sotomayor, Elena Kagan, and Ketanji Brown Jackson indicated that they would have left the injunction in place.

The justices at least agreed to move the case from its shadow docket, which is supposed to be reserved for emergency matters, and onto its list of cases it will consider on the merits this upcoming term, which begins Monday. That means both the government and the parties challenging the policy will have the opportunity to fully brief and argue the legal issues involved. It also means the justices will actually have to explain the decision they make in a signed opinion. Arguments will take place in December, meaning a decision could come by late spring or early summer.

But that serves as no solace to the estimated 25,000 people who have been shipped to countries they have no connection with. Nor will it protect the countless more who face the same fate until or unless the justices choose to stop it.

I know there are Americans who would argue that breaking the law has to come with consequences, otherwise the laws are meaningless. I share that belief.

But I also have a deep and abiding belief in the American legal principles that ensure fairness and justice within that process. Those protections demand that any person facing legal consequences receive proper notice and have the chance to be heard and contest those charges. That is all the parties in this case were asking for, if only on a temporary basis while the Supreme Court ponders its final judgment. But that was too big of an ask for the court's conservatives. Cruel, indeed.

ing the law, as evidenced from the slew of court rulings blocking immigration actions that, in judges' views, have strayed beyond legal and constitutional limits. It's done for show. Just check out the Department of Homeland Security's taxpayer-funded, music video style-social media posts of immigration agents detaining mostly Black and brown people at gunpoint.

But that lack of humanity isn't limited to Trump's White House. It seems to have spread to the nation's highest court's conservative supermajority.

What other explanation could there be for Tuesday's Supreme Court order allowing the Trump administration to resume its third-country removal scheme, under which noncitizens are rapidly sent to countries where they have never been, have no family, and don't speak the local language. Despite the sometimes deadly perils they face, they are given little notice or opportunity to object before being loaded onto planes to destinations from which they may never return.

While a majority of third-country regionals told the Guardian that they were "trapped" in a hotel in Equatorial Guinea, where they were bound, had bags placed on their heads and brutalized in ways that included being pushed downstairs.

Such pending peril has been recounted in media reports, leading one detained Nicaraguan migrant to tell immigration agents, according to the Los Angeles Times: "I'd rather die here than in Africa." What could be the point, if not the cruelty?

Normally in cases where the stakes are so high, it would be reasonable for courts to issue preliminary orders to stop the potential harm to those involved while considering whether the administration's policy runs afoul of the law or Constitution. That is exactly what Boston-based US District Court Judge Brian E. Murphy did in February.

Murphy's order didn't put a halt to third-country deportations, which are allowed in some circumstances under US and international law. But Murphy's order did require those facing third-country deportations a "a meaningful

End to the wiseguy era

They say old soldiers never die, but Spucky Spagnolo was an old soldier and he did, in fact, die the other day. He was 84, and to make it to that ripe old age in his chosen profession is nothing to sneeze at.

Anthony “Spucky” Spagnolo grew up in Revere and was a soldier, first in the US Army, where he served as a para-trooper, then in La Cosa Nostra, the fancy name for the Mafia.

He rose through the wiseguy ranks to eventually become the acting boss of the Patriarca crime family, which was headquartered in Providence and oversaw Boston as one of its fiefdoms.

Though, with all due respect to Spucky, his ascension had as much to do with attrition as with criminal acumen. Which is ironic, as a lot of wiseguys got locked up because of a Mafia induction ceremony Spucky attended more than 35 years ago.

By 2012, when Spucky became acting boss, there weren’t many made guys left, and the mob in Boston was more or less reduced to running sports betting operations and a few assorted scams.

But then the government legalized sports betting and the wiseguys were left with bupkis.

Spucky was part of local Mafia lore. He made his bones, as they like to say, when he allegedly took part in one of the most infamous hits in New England mob history.

Back in the day, Spucky used to run with Bobby Carrozza and Bobby’s step-brother, Joe “J.R.” Russo. Joe Russo was the Bobby Thomson of the Boston mob, the man who got the biggest hit ever for The Outfit in the North End: He whacked Joe Barboza, a thug-turned-stool pigeon who testified against, among others, Boston underboss Jerry Angiulo.

Almost everything Joe Barboza said, egged on by the FBI, was a lie, and he framed four guys for a murder they didn’t commit. The feds moved him to San Francisco, where, naturally, Barboza went right back to crime, because crime paid.

When Joe Russo clipped Joe Barboza in San Francisco in 1976, it put him in the local wiseguy hall of fame, and Spucky, whom the feds claimed was a lookout and getaway driver for that hit, basked in that reflected glory. While Joe Russo was eventually found guilty of the murder, Spucky was never charged in connection with it.

According to the feds, Spucky was an up and comer in 1981 when he, Bobby Carrozza, Freddie Simone, and Vincent “Dee Dee” Gioacchini were in a car the cops stopped outside a Revere nightclub. The club owner had just been beaten up, and Spucky and his buddies matched the description of the attackers. When the cops found two guns under the car seats, Spucky, Bobby, Freddie, and Dee Dee looked at each other with genuine surprise, as if to say, “How’d those get there?”

Still, they beat the rap. The late, great Alan Chapman, Spucky’s lawyer, had a line for the ages while trying to convince the jury that Spucky and his goombahs were innocent.

“You have nothing here,” Chapman told the jurors, “but a lot of suspicious facts.”

In 1989, Spucky ensured his place in national mob history when he was among those who got caught attending a Mafia induction ceremony in Medford.

That induction ceremony led to a series of indictments, including Spucky’s in 1991. He got nine years for racketeering and drug dealing, but, God love him, he refused to admit he was in the Mafia, or that there even such a thing as the Mafia. Unfortunately for Spucky, the tapes the feds made at that induction ceremony were more convincing than his denials.

The induction ceremony was overseen by then-boss Raymond Patriarca Jr., who gave nepotism a bad name after taking over the crime family named for his father.

Vehicle slams into building at campus of Faulkner Hospital, killing bystander

A woman was killed and at least two people were injured Thursday morning when a vehicle crashed into a building on the campus of Brigham and Women’s Faulkner Hospital in Jamaica Plain, rupturing a gas line and prompting the evacuation of more than 30 people, authorities said.

The crash closed the building and forced the hospital to redirect dialysis patients to another site, officials said.

The woman was sitting on a bench in front of Belkin House when the black vehicle struck her, Boston police Superintendent Paul McLaughlin said at a news briefing. She was taken into the hospital’s emergency department but did not survive, officials said.

“This, as you can imagine, has caused significant disruption here at the hospital,” McLaughlin said. “The preliminary investigation indicates that this was not a deliberate act.”

The victim’s name was not immediately released Thursday.

Police are not investigating the crash as a crime, McLaughlin said, calling it “a very tragic situation.”

Two people in the vehicle were injured and also received medical help at the hospital, officials said. The vehicle came to rest between the entrance to the parking garage and the front steps of the Belkin House, a standalone building that the hospital leases to a dialysis clinic.

Boston paramedics were in the area and witnessed the crash. They called 911 call and requested additional support from firefighters and others because of a gas leak, Boston Emergency Medical Services said in a post on X.

Multiple EMS units responded, established a command center, and coordinated a response alongside hospital staff, firefighters, and police officers, the post said.

Four paramedics were evaluated for exposure.

The Belkin House will remain closed Friday, MGB spokesperson Kelly Mitchell said. Dialysis Clinic

Judge denies Clancy request for not guilty verdict

By Shelley Murphy
GLOBE STAFF

A judge denied Lindsay Clancy’s request for a directed verdict of not guilty Thursday, ruling that prosecutors presented sufficient evidence at her trial for a jury to find her criminally responsible for the slayings of her three children, even though jurors were unable to reach a unanimous verdict.

Plymouth Superior Court Judge William F. Sullivan found that the evidence, “when viewed in the light most favorable to the Commonwealth and with the reasonable inferences permitted to be drawn, was sufficient to have satisfied any rational trier of fact beyond a reasonable doubt as to the essential element” of Clancy’s criminal responsibility.

strangled her three children in the basement of their Duxbury home in 2023.

CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY

A judge ruled that sufficient evidence was presented to find her criminally responsible for the slayings.

In the five-page decision, Sullivan wrote that prosecutors presented evidence at Clancy’s six-week trial to support their theory that she knew what she was doing was wrong when she

He noted that prosecutors called three expert witnesses who testified that, in their opinion, Clancy was capable of appreciating the wrongfulness of her actions.

Although Clancy “also produced expert witnesses who disagreed with the Commonwealth’s experts, it is within the discretion of the fact finder to place little or no weight on that evidence,” Sullivan wrote. He cited case law indicating that, “When expert testimony conflicts on the matter of sanity the decision is to be left to the jury.”

In Clancy’s case, Sullivan declared a mistrial Sept. 4 after the jury announced in several notes that it was deadlocked, with jurors voting 11-1 for acquittal based on insanity.

Man charged after woman was allegedly held captive for 6 weeks in Malden attic

By Shannon Larson

The report initially seemed routine — a pair of landlords reporting a dispute with their tenants.

But when police arrived at the Malden home, they discovered a horrific scene, a woman who authorities say was held against her will in appalling conditions for weeks.

The property owners said there was a water leak on the second floor, but the people living in the unit were refusing to let them in. When one landlord tried to enter the attic to fix the problem, a man ran past him down the stairs, leaving a woman sitting on a small mattress in the corner, according to a police report.

The residential building is a short walk away from the Oak Grove MBTA Station and several parks. But until then, no one appeared to notice what was allegedly happening inside.

The landlord immediately contacted police, who went up to the attic.

The space was small and dimly lit, and the insulation was exposed. Electrical wires hung overhead, and trash was scattered across the plywood floor. There was a large bucket filled with urine, police said. The woman wore minimal and dirty clothing. Bite marks and scabs covered her arms and legs. She seemed disoriented, unwell.

Police suspected she was a victim of human trafficking and removed her from the apartment. She later recounted what she had allegedly endured there for weeks, leading to the arrest of Jordende Pierre, 29, four days later.

He pleaded not guilty in Malden District Court on Sept. 25 to felony charges of trafficking a person for sexual servitude, kidnapping, and inde-

Storm prompts extra flight stops out of Logan

By Bryan Hecht
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Last weekend’s nor’easter caused a fuel shortage at Boston’s Logan International Airport, forcing flights to make additional stops days after the storm passed, officials said Thursday.

Hundreds of flights to and from Logan were canceled and delayed over the weekend, as were ships making fuel deliveries needed to replenish Logan’s reserves for refilling aircrafts, said Jennifer Mehigan, a spokesperson for Massport, which operates the airport.

From Sunday to Wednesday, many flights out of Boston had to be diverted to make fueling stops across the country on their way to their destination, airline officials said.

“Due to the forecasted nor’easter, fuel ships couldn’t make their regularly scheduled way up to Boston until it was over,” Mehigan said. “The airport had enough fuel to get through the weekend, but just to be safe, the fueling consortium asked airlines for the last few days to bring extra fuel in their aircraft to lighten the fueling load here.”

Boston faced a shortage of jet fuel from the nor’easter.

On Delta Air Lines, the provider that flies the most planes out of Logan, spokesperson Anthony Black said most short flights in the region addressed the shortage by carrying enough fuel to get to Boston and the next destination, a practice called “tankering.”

But, on longer cross-country flights, there was no choice but to add additional stops to refuel.

From Sunday through Wednesday, roughly a dozen flights from Boston each day were saddled with extra pit stops.

“It’s like an F1 or NASCAR stop,” Black said, explaining the process known as “gas and go.” Customers do not deplane during the stops and are notified ahead of time, he added.

Boston was the only airport Delta serves that saw such disruptions, Black said, even as the nor’easter caused delays in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania.

It remains unclear why the fueling issue only affected services in Boston. Mehigan referred further questions to the airlines.

“There are contingency plans in place, but the unprecedented storm impacted the entire East Coast and caused a bottleneck in the fuel supply chain,” said Michael Hardesty of Delta who manages Logan’s fuel consortium, a joint ownership structure used at most airports that lets airlines pool fuel resources.

Logan never ran out of fuel, Hardesty said. The first new fuel shipment arrived at Logan on Monday and Tuesday, Mehigan said, and more are planned to arrive this week.

Gang member admits to trafficking guns, drugs

By Tonya Alanez
GLOBE STAFF

A Lawrence man who admitted to trafficking guns and drugs in New Hampshire and Maine under the protection of the violent Trinitarios gang will be sentenced in federal court in January, according to the office of Leah B. Foley, US attorney for Massachusetts.

Nilbel Ventura Amaro, 26, pleaded guilty Tuesday in federal court in Boston to two charges — conspiracy to distribute controlled substances and conspiracy to possess firearms in furtherance of drug trafficking, prosecutors said.

Ventura Amaro, who went by the street names Nino, Megamind, Ben, and Migo, was charged in June along with four other members of the transnational criminal organization. His sentencing date has been set for Jan. 6.

Ventura Amaro trafficked drugs in Maine and supplied fentanyl and cocaine to MacKenzie Bimpson, a large-scale drug and firearms dealer currently serving a state sentence in New Hampshire, prosecutors said.

Investigators uncovered numerous photos and videos documenting conversations between the defendants about their drug and gun activities, federal prosecutors said.

If convicted as charged, Ventura Amato faces a maximum penalty of 40 years in prison.

Ventura Amato was the target of a kidnapping in May 2024 after he took over drug distribution in certain area of New Hampshire and Maine, prosecutors said. He was held in a basement for several days.

The two accused kidnappers were arrested in June 2024 and are awaiting trial.

Farwell’s attempt to move murder trial out of state rejected again

By Laura Crimaldi
GLOBE STAFF

For the second time this year, a federal judge on Thursday rejected Matthew Farwell’s request to move his upcoming trial out of state.

Farwell’s lawyers have “not met the high burden of demonstrating that pretrial publicity would prevent” him from receiving a fair trial here, US District Court Chief Judge Denise J. Casper wrote in her decision.

That’s the same language Casper used in January when she turned down Farwell’s request to relocate his trial to Rhode Island.

A hearing in Farwell’s case is set for Friday morning. Jury selection is scheduled to begin Tuesday.

Farwell, 40, a former Stoughton police detective, is accused of strangling Sandra Birchmore, a young pregnant woman he allegedly began sexually exploiting after meeting her when she was a teenager in a youth police Explorers program.

Farwell has pleaded not guilty and asserts Birchmore, 23, killed herself.

On Monday, Farwell asked again to have his trial moved, arguing that coverage of the case in The Boston Globe, Boston Herald, and by local television stations has tainted the jury pool by fostering “widespread public belief that Mr. Farwell is guilty of multiple crimes.”

His lawyers included comments posted to news stories about Farwell and argued they show bias against him.

Prosecutors opposed Farwell’s request; they wrote Farwell “does not meet the high standard” required to relocate his upcoming trial. The prosecution cited the case of Boston Marathon bomber Dzhokhar Tsarnaev, who repeatedly tried and failed to get his death penalty trial moved.

Prosecutors said questionnaires submitted by potential jurors and interviews conducted with them during the empanelment process will identify people with bias and keep them off the jury.

“Farwell will receive a fair and impartial trial in Boston,” the prosecution wrote.

Prosecutors are seeking to seat 12 jurors, plus four alternates, they wrote in court papers.

PRETRIAL PUBLICITY

Matthew Farwell’s lawyers

have argued on behalf of their client that media coverage has tainted the jury pool.

Testimony is expected to take about a month. There are more than 100 possible witnesses and hundreds of possible exhibits, including thousands of text messages between Farwell and Birchmore.

Birchmore was eight to 10 weeks pregnant when she died, and had told Farwell that he was the father. DNA testing later excluded Farwell as the father of Birchmore’s unborn son.

Federal prosecutors allege Farwell killed Birchmore to cover up that he had been sexually exploiting her beginning when she was 15, and he was 27, and other alleged crimes.

Farwell and Birchmore met some time after she enrolled in the Stoughton Police Department Explorers Program in 2010, the year she turned 13. Farwell participated in the program as a youth and stayed involved as a volunteer instructor.

Farwell is charged with killing a witness, Birchmore, and causing the death of her unborn baby boy. If convicted, he faces life in prison.

Testimony is expected to cover disputes over whether Birchmore was killed or died by suicide, allegations of child sexual exploitation and police misconduct, and questions over whether the initial investigation into her death was adequate.

Prosecutors wrote in court papers that they are collaborating with Farwell’s attorneys to develop a questionnaire for potential jurors.

Defendants in Harvard building explosion receive probation

Halloween antics preceded blast

By Travis Andersen
GLOBE STAFF

The two men who caused a small explosion inside a Harvard Medical School building last Halloween avoided jail time Thursday, as a federal judge sentenced each to three years of probation.

Logan David Patterson, 19, of Plymouth, and Dominick Frank Cardoza, 21, of Bourne, were also ordered to perform roughly 300 hours of community service and jointly pay $28,517 in restitution for damage caused by the explosion.

US District Court Judge Angel Kelley declined prosecutors' request that the first six months of their probation be served in home confinement.

"I believe the harsh consequences that flowed from this conviction are a sufficient deterrent," Kelley said.

Both men pleaded guilty in April to conspiracy to damage a building by means of fire and an explosive.

No one was injured in the blast, which damaged the fourth floor of the medical school's Goldenson Building in Boston's Longwood area during the pre-dawn hours of Nov. 1, 2025, after the pair had been at multiple Halloween parties with friends.

Along with probation, community service, and restitution, Patterson and Cardoza were ordered to write letters apologizing to Harvard.

Patterson also apologized in court.

"This was a very serious act," Patterson said. "At the time, I thought my actions were harmless and they turned out to be much bigger."

Prosecutors had recommended three years of probation, with the first six months on home confinement. In sentencing papers, they acknowledged the defendants' youth while emphasizing the seriousness of what they did.

ASSOCIATED PRESS FILE

"The defendant committed a serious offense, even if that offense was motivated by immaturity and revelry rather than more serious intentions to cause damage or fear," prosecutors wrote.

Outside court, Stefan Rozembersky, a lawyer for Cardoza, called the sentence fair and stressed that neither man had a criminal record.

"This was not a terrorist attack. This was not a coordinated attack against the government or aimed at Harvard; this was a couple of kids with firecrackers, not even bombs," Rozembersky said, calling it "mischief that went way out of control."

But he said the felony convictions would continue to carry serious consequences for the men.

"It's not without severity," he said. "Having this felony record is going keep them from having some things in life and harm them for a long time."

The break-in and explosion prompted a massive emergency response and unnerved the elite campus, home to cutting-edge medical research.

The blast caused little property damage but drew national attention given the contemporary political climate, particularly at elite universities such as Harvard, which the Trump administration has accused of fostering a climate of antisemitism, a charge the Ivy League institution has adamantly and resolutely denied.

According to an FBI affidavit, the pair arrived at Wentworth Institute of Technology around 8 p.m., meeting up with several people who were going out for Halloween festivities.

Cameras began to record them in Longwood after 2 a.m., and they were seen walking toward the medical school campus at 2:23 a.m.

At 2:24 a.m., they set off what appeared to be Roman candle fireworks outside, footage showed.

A few minutes later, video footage from the Goldenson Building shows them climbing a chain-link fence and hopping into a construction area, the affidavit said. At 2:36 a.m., they're spotted climbing scaffolding next to the building and getting onto the roof.

At 2:45 a.m., police received an alert that there had been an explosion on the fourth floor of the building, which houses a research laboratory that focuses on neurobiology.

They soon left the building, fleeing in opposite directions, according to video footage.

A message was sent to Harvard officials seeking comment Thursday night.

Family of Springfield teen who drowned on school trip sues camp

GLOBE STAFF

The Connecticut day camp where a Springfield teenager drowned on a middle school trip in June allowed too many children into the camp's pool that day and operated without proper permits, the family alleged in a wrongful death lawsuit filed this week.

E'Mari Marshall-Woodard, an eighth grader at Kiley Prep Middle School, drowned in the pool at the High Meadow Day Camp in Granby, the lawsuit stated.

The pool's maximum capacity of 142 people had been reduced by the closure of the diving area to 105 people, according to the lawsuit.

When the 14-year-old drowned, there were 150 children in the pool watched over by three lifeguards, the lawsuit alleged. The water quality was poor, with low visibility, it stated.

"In those conditions, E'Mari disappeared beneath the surface within a crowd and drowned in shallow water," the lawsuit alleges. "Resuscitative efforts failed and E'Mari was pronounced dead at 4:11 pm."

According to the lawsuit, 800 students from Springfield and several Connecticut school districts had paid $53 per child for admission to the 150-acre park.

The lawsuit names High Meadow Management Company and 311 LLC as the defendants. The lawsuit identified James D. Cunningham and Michael F. Cunningham as the owners of High Meadow and a second recreational area, Holiday Hill in Prospect, Conn.

The lawsuit alleges that as of June 10, the resort had not received the required "annual authorization from the Farmington Valley Health District to open the pool for the season."

A staffer who answered the phone at High Meadow on Wednesday said no one was available to comment.

The company is accepting reservations for the 2027 season, according to its website.

In June, the boy's mother, Maurissa Marshall, recalled her son as a "math wizard" and said she was devastated by his death.

"I've been crying like crazy because a lot of the kids have reached out to me," she said. "He loved school. He likes to be on time. He didn't like to get things wrong. He's an amazing mathematician."

He told her every day that he loved her, Marshall said.

Granby is a town in northern Hartford County, near the Massachusetts border. It is about a 30-minute drive from Springfield.

Four in N.H. sue over Medicaid ban on gender-affirming care

By Steven Porter
GLOBE STAFF

Four transgender children from lower-income families in New Hampshire filed a federal lawsuit Thursday challenging a new Medicaid rule that will soon block coverage for the gender-affirming medication their doctors view as medically necessary.

The patients — who are 11, 13, 15, and 15 years old — and their parents are represented by a coalition of advocacy groups. They allege the Trump administration violated their constitutional rights and broke the law by adopting an arbitrary policy for political reasons.

This lawsuit isn't the first to dispute the Medicaid rule change, which goes into effect on Oct. 13. A coalition of more than a dozen states, including Massachusetts, filed suit last month, accusing the federal government of illegally usurping state authority in administering the health programs that insure more than 73 million Americans.

But while many Democrat-led states have explored ways to counteract the impacts of this Medicaid change, there has been no evidence of comparable conversations underway in New Hampshire, where Republicans hold a trifecta in state government, said Chris Erchull, senior staff attorney for GLBTQ Legal Advocates & Defenders.

New Hampshire is the only state in New England that has banned puberty blockers and hormone therapy for transgender minors. The only kids allowed to undergo such gender-affirming treatments in the state are those who began doing so prior to Jan. 1, 2026.

Erchull said the government's move to deny Medicaid coverage for these medications — which comes after President Trump issued executive orders denouncing "gender ideology extremism" and directing federal agencies to bring an end to what he called the "chemical and surgical mutilation of children" — is part of a broader campaign to purge transgender people from public life.

"It's just a glaring example of the hostility that this administration has been demonstrating toward transgender people," he said.

The federal agency that oversees Medicaid and the Children's Health Insurance Program adopted a final rule in August that will begin denying coverage for two types of gender-affirming medications: puberty blockers and hormone therapy.

"The impact is falling on the most economically disadvantaged families in America, those who are dependent on Medicaid benefits for accessing health care," Erchull said. "These are people who don't have another option available to them. They have nowhere else to turn."

The final rule also prohibits spending federal dollars on gender-affirming surgeries for minors, which are rare. But the newly filed New Hampshire lawsuit doesn't directly challenge that component of the policy.

"None of these plaintiffs are asking for surgical intervention or need it at this time," Erchull said.

A spokesperson said the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services wouldn't comment on a matter of pending litigation.

The young patients in this lawsuit, who are all identified by pseudonyms to protect their private health information, obtained diagnoses of gender dysphoria years ago, according to court filings.

Dr. Frances B. Lim-Liberty — who is employed as a pediatric endocrinologist at Dartmouth Health, but emphasized she is speaking in her individual capacity — said halting these medications would lead to puberty-driven changes and exacerbate the gender dysphoria that families and physicians have worked carefully for years to manage.

"We're really looking at a forced detransition," she said.

'These are people who don't have another option available to them.'

CHRIS ERCHULL,
Senior staff attorney for GLBTQ Legal Advocates & Defenders

All four of the plaintiff patients in this case are transgender girls, so blocking their continued access to these medications would result in masculinizing changes to their bodies, such as developing a deeper voice, facial hair, an Adam's apple, and changes to their bones and faces, according to the lawsuit.

Lim-Liberty said masculine characteristics are difficult to override with hormones alone after puberty has passed.

Professional medical groups overwhelmingly accept gender-affirming care as medically appropriate for adolescents, and the plaintiffs contend the care they have been receiving is essential. But their treatments can cost as much as $70,000 per year each without Medicaid coverage, which is more than their families can afford.

"Medicaid is their lifeline," Lim-Liberty said. "When that is removed or no longer is able to cover certain important aspects of their medical care, it's really hard for families to find other places they can go to access care."

The plaintiffs — who are represented by GLAD Law, the National Center for LGBTQ Rights, and the American Civil Liberties Union of New Hampshire — are asking the judge to block enforcement, invalidate the final rule in its entirety, and issue a declaratory judgment finding that the rule was "motivated by discriminator animus against transgender individuals" in violation of the US Constitution.

Judge denies Lindsay Clancy’s request for not guilty verdict bands on Jan. 24, 2023, after sending her husband, Patrick, out to pick up medication and takeout for dinner. However, she pleaded not guilty to first-degree murder charges, asserting she suffered a psychotic episode and couldn’t resist a man’s voice she hallucinated commanding her to kill them and herself. Afterward, she slashed her neck and wrists and jumped out of a second-story window, leaving her paralyzed from the waist down.

Clancy’s lawyer, Kevin Reddington, asserted that she was failed by the medical system after seeking help for postpartum depression and anxiety following the birth of her third child. In the months and weeks leading up to the slayings, she was prescribed more than a dozen medications, made trips to the emergency room, called a suicide prevention hotline twice, and was voluntarily committed to McLean Hospital for five days.

Prosecutors allege she premeditated the slayings because she was deeply depressed, under, Clancy could waive her right to a jury trial and let a judge decide her fate.

During a hearing Wednesday, Reddington urged Sullivan to order a directed verdict of not guilty in Clancy’s case, arguing dington’s claims “laughable,” noting the defense repeatedly stipulated at trial to physical evidence showing she killed her three children in the basement of their Duxbury home in 2023.

In Thursday’s decision, Sulli-isfy any rational trier of fact beyond a reasonable doubt,” Sullivan wrote.

Sullivan is slated to hear arguments Nov. 2 on a flurry of additional motions, including a request to drop murder charges against Clancy on double jeopardy grounds.

The defense argues that she should not be subjected to another trial because 11 jurors were poised to find her not guilty by reason of insanity and the lone holdout juror was accused of refusing to follow the judge’s instructions regarding reasonable doubt. Prosecutors oppose that motion, and a lawyer representing the juror has said he had no doubts when pushing for a guilty verdict.

Plymouth District Attorney Timothy Cruz has yet to decide whether to retry Clancy on first-degree murder charges, which would require the empanelment of another jury. If he reduces the charges to second-degree mur-

“She was told what happened; she had no memory of what happened,” Reddington said.

Assistant District Attorney Shanan Buckingham called Red-

Clancy was required to admit to the slayings while asserting an insanity defense because the judge “created a conundrum” by denying the defense request for a bifurcated trial. The defense wanted jurors to decide whether Clancy was guilty during the first phase of the trial, then, if she was, move on to a second

Inc., which operates at the facility, is redirecting its patients to other sites, she added.

The Belkin House, which also houses administrative offices, was evacuated as a precaution while crews checked gas lines for potential damage. Thirty two people including patients and staff were safely evacuated, hospital officials said.

The building was in the process of “incrementally” reopening operations, McLaughlin said.

“Brigham and Women’s Faulkner Hospital is deeply saddened by this tragic incident,” MGB spokesperson Kelly Mitchell wrote in a statement, adding hospital staff can receive support through an employee assistance program. “We extend our sincere condolences to the family of the individual who died and to those who were injured. Our thoughts are also with all who witnessed today’s events.”

Esmeralda Villar was leaving the hospital around 11 a.m. when she walked past the aftermath of the crash.

She said she saw blood on the sidewalk outside the building. She said the driver appeared to be an elderly man and worried he may have hit the accelerator by accident.

The cause of the crash is under investigation, officials said.

Around noon, roughly a dozen patients who said they were receiving treatment at the dialysis center sat on the lawn waiting for rides home.

Mike Jones, who came to pick up his mother, said he got a call to pick her up halfway through her treatment.

Medical staff checked on patients who were evacuated from a building on the Faulkner campus.

“I just hope everyone’s OK, that’s all I can say,” he said.

His mother said she was not harmed and didn’t witness the crash.

Caution tape surrounded the hospital lawn, where staff watched over patients being sent home.

By Thursday evening, the area largely had been cleared of debris. A chunk of white metal fence remained on the grass. Blood was no longer visible. All was quiet but for a sanitation crew cleaning the Belkin House entrance.

This is not the first time that a vehicle crash has occurred on the hospital campus.

In 2024, a nurse sleeping in her car while on call suffered multiple broken bones after accidentally pressing the gas and driving off the top floor of the hospital’s parking garage.

Woman allegedly held in an attic cent assault and battery on a person 14 or older, according to court records.

He was ordered held without bail pending a dangerousness hearing on Oct. 6, records show.

In a police report filed in court after his arraignment, investigators disclosed grim details in a case authorities have described as “deeply disturbing.”

“No person should ever be subjected to the violence, exploitation, and loss of freedom alleged here,” Dennis Matulewicz, US marshal for Massachusetts, said in a statement last week.

The woman told police she met Pierre about six weeks earlier on the dating app Tinder. He picked her up from the rehab facility she was staying in and brought her to his residence in the Oak Grove neighborhood, the report said. She said she remained inside the attic, only leaving a couple of times, until police arrived on Sept. 20.

She referred to Pierre as her “boyfriend,” according to the report.

The woman said she was given crack cocaine and smoked it daily. A man she called “Skinny” who lived on the second floor gave Pierre the drugs, and she told police she was forced to have sex with Skinny’s and Pierre’s friends as payment for the drugs. Authorities have not said whether the drug supplier will face charges.

The woman told police that she is addicted to cocaine and crack.

Pierre would also arrange “dates” between her and multiple men, the report said.

Pierre would take money from the men and the woman said she would have to “perform sexual acts on the men in the attic bed,” police wrote in the report. “[The woman] stated that she never received the money.”

She estimated that this happened on 16 different occasions. The conversations between the men and Pierre were all believed to be in Haitian Creole, leaving the woman unable to understand them, according to the report.

She told police that Pierre regularly forced her to have sex with him. When she said she didn’t want to, he “would become enraged and begin to scream at her,” the report said. She feared abuse if she refused, police said.

The woman told police she often went days without eating. Only when she asked Pierre directly for food, she said, did he bring her something to eat.

At the time of his arrest, Pierre was on release for assault and battery and weapons charges out of Somerville, records show. He had been ordered to stay away from and not contact or abuse the alleged victim.

An attorney for Pierre could not immediately be reached for comment.

For decades, federal prosecutors used the induction ceremony tapes to prove the Mafia did, in fact, exist and dozens of Mafia leaders and soldiers were carted off to prison for long stretches as a result.

Speaking of stretches, when Spucky got out of prison, he teamed up with a soldier named Pryce “Stretch” Quintana, and they began picking over the bones of the old wiseguys’s business.

Alas, Spucky and Quintana got jammed up in 2014 for threatening guys at the Moose Lodge in Revere over illegal video poker games.

Bosses, acting or otherwise, used to be insulated from doing the dirty work. But there weren’t enough soldiers anymore, and the only insulation guys like Spucky had was in the attic.

At that infamous induction ceremony in Medford, Spucky watched on as the newly made guys burned the card of a saint.

These days, the Mafia might as well burn an AARP card at the Moose Lodge in Revere.

In Boston, the Mafia that Spucky Spagnolo once served now sleeps with the fishes.

Bank of America donates $10m to psychiatric hospital for children

GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Boston Children's Hospital has received $10 million to support its construction of a new pediatric psychiatric campus in Brighton, officials said Thursday.

The donation from Bank of America will go toward the $640 million hospital at Franciscan Children's campus. The new space will offer inpatient, outpatient, and rehabilitation services at a larger scale and in a reimagined facility compared to the current campus, hospital representatives said.

The construction comes at a time of rising mental and behavioral health issues among children, studies show.

The bank's gift will be pooled with the project's capital funds, and the bank's name will be emblazoned on a rooftop play area.

"Bank of America is putting a stake in the ground that child mental health is absolutely critical and important," said Dr. Stacy Drury, psychiatrist in chief at Boston Children's. "We're going to say that it is okay to invest and care about child mental health."

The announcement comes almost a year after a historic $100 million donation to jumpstart the project from Quincy billionaire philanthropists Rob and Karen Hale. It was the largest gift in the hospital's history. The first building is expected to break ground on Oct. 8 and open in 2029.

Business group's new rankings show Mass. stuck near bottom on jobs and costs

As a kid, when I brought home As and Bs on a report card, my parents always said the same thing: "Nice, but we know you can do better." But even one C — an F in Mom and Dad's book — got an ominously terse warning: "Do better."

Massachusetts has been bringing home plenty of Cs and worse for three straight years on a report card that aims to assess its economic vitality and ability to attract and retain residents and businesses.

Just as troubling, the state's performance in areas where it has struggled has barely improved since the Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation, a business-backed policy group, issued its first competitiveness scorecard in 2024.

The latest: An exclusive first look at MTF's 2026 report shows Massachusetts once again ranked near the bottom of all states in key categories.

Among them: job growth, loss of residents to other states, commute times, and, most important, costs for energy, infant child care, and employer-paid health insurance.

MTF's rankings are data-driven, based on government and private statistics.

In addition, the state lost ground in metrics where it had scored better in previous years. On the rate of labor force growth, the increase in people working or looking for a job, Massachusetts fell to 39th from 10th, in part because of a drop in immigration.

DURHAM, N.H. — Incoming college students from New Hampshire whose families earn up to $100,000 per year will soon qualify for free tuition at any of the three institutions that comprise the University System of New Hampshire, officials announced Thursday.

A new program, called the New Hampshire Promise, will be available to Granite Staters enrolling for the first time in fall 2027 at the University of New Hampshire, Keene State College, and Plymouth State University.

Cathy Provencher, the university system's chancellor, said the initiative will give students a potentially "transformative" opportunity.

"In launching this new program, all of the university system institutions are working together to make higher education more accessible for more New Hampshire students, enabling them to pursue their dreams right here in the Granite State," she said in a statement.

Suit: DraftKings 'weaponized' AI to promote addiction

By Yogev Toby
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

A federal lawsuit was filed against online gambling platform DraftKings Wednesday, alleging the Boston-based company uses predatory AI models that promote gambling addiction for profit.

The proposed class action lawsuit filed in US District Court in Boston alleges that DraftKings used artificial intelligence to identify customers who are more likely to gamble and lose, and thus spend more money in response to targeted promotions.

Plaintiff Daniel Vest, of West Virginia, says in the lawsuit that he lost thousands of dollars while gambling through DraftKings. He filed the lawsuit on behalf of himself and to represent all those who received targeted promotions. He said in the lawsuit that in the month prior to Sept. 26, he received about 70 emails, texts, notifications, and other messages from DraftKings, coaxing him to spend more money gambling.

Action overseas as Wall St. idle

More swings in the bond market rattled stock markets around the world on Thursday. On Wall Street, the moves were relatively modest after US bond yields cranked higher but then gave back the gains later in the day. The moves were more dramatic in Europe, where stock indexes tumbled 1.7 percent in London, 1.6 percent in Paris, and 1 percent in Frankfurt. They were hurt by sharp moves for bond yields on that side of the Atlantic. The yield on the 10-year French government bond, for example, seesawed between 4.8 percent and 4.95 percent. That is a punishing swing for the bond market, where moves get measured in hundredths of a percentage point. Oil prices climbed again Thursday to keep the pressure up on inflation. The price for a barrel of Brent crude leaped 4.4 percent to $102.31 for its latest yo-yo move on uncertainty about when the war with Iran will allow the global oil industry to return to normal. Further reports also signaled the US economy is powering through its many challenges. Fewer US workers applied for unemployment benefits last week, which could mean companies are laying off fewer workers.

Mass. stuck near bottom on jobs, costs

After the unemployment rate ticked up last year, the state dropped to 43rd from 31st.

But there is good news, too. The state remained in the top 5 in areas of traditional strength, including economic productivity (second), average weekly wages (third), and venture capital investments (second). It climbed into the top 10 for low poverty rates.

Why it matters: The lack of progress over the past three years underscores that making Massachusetts a more appealing place to live or run a company will be a slog.

“Turning the ship is a slow process,” said Doug Howgate, MTF’s president. “We are not going to lose our strengths overnight. At the same time, the work being done on things such as housing costs, energy costs, and commute times is nowhere near finished.”

Closing the gap: As the Globe has detailed in a series of stories, Massachusetts is losing jobs and people to other states with lower taxes, cheaper living costs, and less burdensome business regulations.

Florida, North Carolina, and Texas still lagged Massachusetts in economic productivity (per-capita economic output)

DAVID L. RYAN/GLOBE STAFF

The lack of progress underscores that making the state a more appealing place to live or run a company will be a slog.

last year, but they posted faster increases over the past one- and five-year periods.

Venture capital investments in Massachusetts rose 7 percent last year, while Florida, New York, California, and Texas saw increases of more than 50 percent.

Texas, ranked third in number of international students, increased enrollment 8.4 percent last year, while in fourth-ranked Massachusetts, enrollment grew by just 2.2 percent.

D.C. complications: MTF highlighted two examples of Trump administration policies pressuring the state.

Immigration restrictions. The rate of international migration to Massachusetts fell by almost half last year, a major factor — along with boomer retirements — in the shrinking labor force.

Meanwhile, growth in international student enrollments at colleges and universities has slowed for two years in a row, a trend that, if continued, could take a meaningful toll on their tuition revenue and research operations.

National Institutes of Health funding. Massachusetts receives more NIH grant money per capita than any other state.

Funding dropped 2.7 percent in the last federal fiscal year from the peak in 2023.

“While many NIH grants resumed after the court overturned the Trump administration’s effort to eliminate funding, new federal regulations have been announced that could further limit access to funding if research projects are not aligned with the administration’s agenda,” MTF said.

Final thought: There are no simple solutions for improving the state’s competitiveness.

But MTF, like other business groups, has policy priorities.

Cut the estate tax and the amount employers pay into the unemployment insurance fund. Spur housing production in downtown areas. Support research institutions hit by federal funding cuts. And enact a rigorous statewide high school graduation standard to ensure that the state protects its highly ranked K-12 education system.

Offsetting lost tax revenues and funding incentives to build more housing without sacrificing essential services are not insignificant challenges. But ideas like these should be getting more serious attention from state and local leaders.

I know we can do better.

mental health care facilities, meaning children can move between levels of care in the same space, which she said can be helpful for kids with neurodevelopmental disorders or disabilities.

Inpatient units will include 60 beds for inpatient psychiatric care and 60 for complex care and medical rehabilitation. All inpatient rooms will have a single bed. Past designs could house up to four beds in a room and lead to blocked beds due to a mental health condition that prevents shared rooms. Such expansion will reduce wait times, improve early intervention, and ensure accurate diagnosis and care, per the hospital’s announcement.

The overall design of the new campus will include large windows with ample daylight, outdoor spaces, and dedicated family rooms, where patients’ relatives can take personal calls or time for themselves while remaining near their loved one.

“It is an entire system in one physical space to ensure seamless care,” Drury said.

The hospital’s announcement said the new campus will create between 150 and 200 new jobs in the community and more than 3,320 construction jobs.

On Thursday, about 25 Bank of America workers volunteered at the Franciscan hospital and spent time with patients in the medical rehabilitation and behavioral health units.

When Holly O’Neill, Bank of America’s president of consumer, retail, and preferred banking, toured the hallways of the current Franciscan campus, she noted its age and dark atmosphere.

“It felt very isolating,” she told the Globe. “I think that is really what opens the door to a space that’s more thoughtfully designed.”

She touted Boston Children’s commitment to provide care that is designed to meet the needs of patients.

“I’ve experienced Boston Children’s as a parent and appreciate the care that they provide,” she said. “I know firsthand from friends and family that [mental health care for children] is a need.”

MGB dismisses nurses union’s claim about postponed summit

Brigham and Women’s Hospital nurses who are prepared to go on strike indefinitely claimed Thursday that a planned action for next week prompted Mass General Brigham to delay a major event, while the health system dismissed the union’s assertion as the contract negotiation stalemate continues.

The 10th Annual Mass General Brigham Summit was slated for next Wednesday at the system’s Somerville headquarters. Anna Brown, MGB’s senior vice president of human resources, told staff Tuesday the event was “being postponed to a future date,” according to a message the Massachusetts Nurses Association circulated Thursday morning.

The MNA argued the scheduling change happened after the union issued a picket notice for outside the event. Nurses and clinicians also protested outside MGB’s World Medical Innovation Forum last week in the Seaport, drawing support from US Representatives Stephen Lynch and Richard Neal, the MNA said.

“MGB may pretend that everything is business as usual, but our protests about their corporate greed are clearly upsetting the billionaires who run MGB,” said Kelly Morgan, a labor and delivery nurse and chair of the Brigham bargaining committee.

“As 4,000 Brigham nurses prepare for a potential open-ended strike, we have one message for MGB: Negotiate a fair contract that protects our patients and respects the world-class care we provide,” she added.

MGB achieved a profit of nearly $2.4 billion in fiscal 2025, according to a recent state report.

Brigham nurses last week voted to authorize an open-ended strike, after their July work stoppage did not create a breakthrough in contract negotiations. Nurses want cost-of-living increases and affordable health insurance, while MGB says that nurses receive annual 5 percent raises as part of a 20-step wage scale.

MGB spokesperson Jessica Pastore said the union’s press release was “inaccurate” and that the summit was “not postponed because of the MNA.”

“The MGB Annual Summit is hosted by our Office of Workforce Enrichment and is intended to provide a safe space for all members of our workforce to come together for inclusive, transparent, and respectful dialogue about workplace culture and belonging,” Pastore said. “It is unfortunate that the postponement of an event that is valued by so many of our employees is being celebrated by the MNA.”

Ahead of Labor Day weekend, Governor Maura Healey called on MGB to schedule another bargaining session and “then stay at it until contracts are done.” Pastore said MGB has unsuccessfully tried to schedule sessions through a federal mediator.

DELIVERY

AMAZON SETTLES LAWSUIT OVER CLAIMS OF SLOW DELIVERIES TO LOW-INCOME NEIGHBORHOODS

Amazon on Thursday settled a lawsuit brought by the District of Columbia over claims it made slower deliveries in the city's low-income neighborhoods, as the e-commerce giant faces pressure from government officials over how it runs its vast logistics network. The lawsuit, filed in 2024 by Attorney General Brian Schwalb in Superior Court of the District of Columbia, argued Amazon had excluded two ZIP codes from its in-house Prime delivery services. Those ZIP codes covered historically low-income areas, the lawsuit said. The company failed to inform customers about the slower deliveries and violated the District of Columbia's consumer protection laws, according to the lawsuit. Under the terms of the settlement, Amazon will refund $7.25 million in Prime membership fees to affected customers, according to a news release. The company will also pay a $1 million penalty to the district and agreed to notify Amazon customers there of future restrictions on its delivery service. The attorney general's office said roughly 69,000 members of Amazon's Prime service experienced slower deliveries as a result of Amazon's practices. "Amazon deceived thousands of its customers," Schwalb said in a news release. "Now, we're putting more than $7 million back in the pockets of people who were taken advantage of." An Amazon spokesperson, Steve Kelly, said the company had never deceived anyone about the deliveries and in "no way is this settlement an admission of wrongdoing." "Rather than engage in prolonged litigation, we chose to resolve this matter so we can stay focused on what we do best: delivering great service to every customer across Washington, D.C.," he said.

MORTGAGE RATES KEEP CLIMBING, LEADING SOME BUYERS TO RISKIER LOANS

Mortgage rates continue to creep higher, compounding an affordability crunch that has squeezed many Americans' wallets. Now soaring rates are prompting some homebuyers to roll the dice that they will fall in a few years. The average 30-year, fixed-rate mortgage, the most popular home loan in the United States, rose to 7.28 percent this week, up from 7.03 percent last week and the highest since November 2023, mortgage financing giant Freddie Mac said Thursday. "Mortgage rates jumped to their highest level in almost three years, pushing borrowers to the sidelines," said Joel Kan, deputy chief economist at the Mortgage Bankers Association, a trade group. Mortgage rates had fallen below 6 percent at the end of February but began to inch higher after the United States and Israel attacked Iran on Feb. 28. The war in Iran has driven up energy costs, which in turn has stoked inflation fears. In response, investors have pushed up the yield on the 10-year Treasury note, which on Thursday reached its highest level since 2002. The 10-year Treasury yield underpins a wide range of consumer and corporate borrowing, including mortgages. With the yield climbing quickly, the jump in mortgage rates this week was the biggest since October 2022. Adjustable-rate mortgages can be significantly lower than their fixed-rate counterparts, real estate experts say, sometimes as much as a full percentage point, a difference that can potentially save homebuyers thousands of dollars annually. The ARM, as the loan is known, also comes with the risk that rates will continue to climb, hurting owners when the loan resets. ARMs are an increasingly enticing option among buyers put off by the jump in fixed-rate mortgages, Kan said, adding, "They are looking for more ways to get into that home." The association reported a recent uptick in the share of ARM applications, to 10.3 percent of overall mortgage applications, the highest in a year.

MARYLAND GOVERNOR FORMS BIPARTISAN GROUP ON AI, CITES FEDERAL INACTION

Governor Wes Moore (below left) of Maryland is forming a bipartisan group of governors to respond to mounting concerns about the threats posed by artificial intelligence as he argued that states need to fill a void left by the federal government's inaction on the issue. In an interview, Moore, a Democrat, criticized President Trump's meeting with AI executives at the White House this week as a "billionaire boys club." He was also critical of Congress for leaving Washington until after next month's midterms without addressing the rapidly evolving technology. "The federal government has a unique leadership role that they have to play and that includes both the White House and Congress," Moore said after speaking at an innovation conference in Baltimore. "In the absence of that, the governors cannot just sit on our hands." Moore is the chair of the National Governors Association this year and said his co-chair, Republican Governor Mike Braun of Indiana, would partner with him in developing an AI framework. Other governors from both parties are planning to participate, Moore said. Increasingly dire warnings from tech executives that AI could pose an existential threat to humanity have tested the ability of governments at all levels to respond nimbly to fast-moving developments. So far, states have been more active than the federal government, but their power is limited when it comes to dealing with a technology that spans the country and the globe.

JOBS

UNEMPLOYMENT CLAIMS DIP TO 197,000, LOWEST SINCE MID-JULY

The number of people applying for US unemployment benefits dipped last week to the lowest level since mid-July as layoffs remain low and most American workers enjoy job security. The Labor Department said Thursday that initial jobless claims ticked down to 197,000 from a revised 198,000 the week before. The four-week average of claims, which smooths out week-to-week volatility, dropped by 2,500 to 200,000. Claims for jobless benefits are a proxy for layoffs, and economists watch them because they can be a sign of where the job market is headed. So far this year, claims have mostly stayed below 220,000 — historically low. The American job market has remained sturdy despite higher energy prices that have squeezed businesses and consumers since the fighting with Iran began Feb. 28. The United States on Tuesday reported that US employers posted fewer job openings in August. The Labor Department's Job Openings and Labor Turnover Survey also showed that layoffs fell and the number of people quitting their jobs — a sign of confidence in their prospects — retreated slightly in August. The report's measure of gross hiring — before subtracting people who quit or lost their jobs — ticked up modestly in August but remains at low levels.

NIKE'S RESULTS FALL SHORT OF ESTIMATES AS COMPANY SEARCHES FOR ITS COMEBACK

Nike Inc. said it's consolidating its operations and cutting jobs while warning that its sales slump is poised to deepen. The company now sees revenue declining in the high-single digits in the current fiscal year. That's worse than the 2.4 percent drop that's projected in a Bloomberg survey of analysts. Sales were $11.2 billion in the company's fiscal first quarter ended Aug. 31, a decline of 4 percent and below the average of estimates. Chief executive Elliott Hill is about to begin his third year leading Nike, and pressure is mounting for the company to show signs of improvement. Nike's stock has slumped more than 40 percent this year, and it's headed for a fifth consecutive annual decline. On Thursday, the shares fell 4 percent at 4:41 p.m. in extended trading in New York. Nike plans to consolidate its geographical divisions. Greater China, which saw its a ninth consecutive quarterly decline, is being merged into its broader Asia Pacific region. Latin America, which previously was grouped with Asia Pacific, will be combined with North America. Hill said in a memo to employees that the change, along with other upcoming moves, means that "Nike will require fewer roles over time" and decisions about which roles will be impacted will be made beginning next year. The company expects the plan to generate $2.5 billion in savings over the next five years. It will generate about $1 billion of pre-tax charges. "The future will belong to companies that can move faster, serve athletes and consumers more locally, and invest more aggressively in innovation," Hill said in the memo. The latest report suggests the company's problems are getting worse. Nike's direct-to-consumer revenue missed expectations, as did the footwear division. Poor results at Boston-based Converse persisted, and the brand has now posted 14 straight quarters of falling sales. In China, Nike faces nimble local competition and a growing preference for national brands. Converse's performance has been marred by an overreliance on the Chuck Taylor All-Star shoe. A recent ad that evoked the Ku Klux Klan has further roiled the brand and sparked a temporary pause on advertising.

In Massachusetts, gambling organizations must disclose all use of AI and automated capabilities to the state.

Suit: DraftKings ‘weaponized’ AI to promote addiction

"DK has weaponized AI to do just that — understand and exploit users' vulnerabilities to financially benefit the company," the lawsuit says.

The lawsuit also alleges that DraftKings collected and analyzed data points for each user, including their spending habits and how much they typically lose. The company allegedly then failed to disclose to users that it was using AI or machine learning for that purpose, violating Massachusetts state law.

"DraftKings does not use AI to target customers based on losses, nor do we use AI to target customers based on indicators of potential problem gaming," a DraftKings spokesperson said in a statement Thursday. "We intend to vigorously defend any potential lawsuits on the matter."

The lawsuit comes after a September investigation from The New York Times uncovered the trend, and the lawsuit quotes heavily from the Times article. The Massachusetts Gaming Commission, the state regulator overseeing DraftKings and other gambling companies, said last week that it would examine the allegations against the company and others operating in the state.

In a Wednesday interview with the online news outlet The Wrap, DraftKings chief executive Jason Robins refuted the Times' report, calling it "slandorous."

"They said that we are writing models to target people that have problem gaming issues, which is not true," Robins said in the interview, which was released ahead of the lawsuit's filing. "In fact, we tell people to do the opposite, to try to figure out if people have problem gaming issues and give them warnings and eventually shut down their accounts if we need to."

According to the lawsuit, a former DraftKings employee said he had worked on a system that identified people who were trying to ditch the platform. The system would then try to pull them back in, the employee told the Times.

Another former employee developed a program that boosted promotions for people who were gambling "more aggressively than usual," according to the lawsuit.

"It is as predatory as it sounds," a former employee told the Times, which is quoted in the lawsuit.

And DraftKings, the lawsuit alleges, reaped the benefits.

Analytics and data science helped drive up margins on promotion-driven sports bets by 13 percent in 2025 the lawsuit says. The program used AI to personalize hundreds of millions of promotional dollars, the lawsuit says.

The lawsuit refers to Citizens Bank research that showed DraftKings boasted around $8.7 billion in gross revenue from sports and casino gamblers in 2025, and handed out roughly $3 billion in promotions. Per Massachusetts law, gambling organizations must disclose all use of AI and automated capabilities to the Gaming Commission, as well as report the ways in which they analyze customer data to mitigate addictive behavior. Gambling organizations are prohibited from using personal customer information in promotional material that uses AI or another form of an automated system.

"The New York Times does a very good job of reporting and checking their facts. But, as a government agency, we need to do some fact-finding on the ground," said Thomas Mills, a gaming commission spokesperson. The commission declined to comment on active litigation or say what its investigation into DraftKings would entail.

"We'll start with a conversation," Mills added.

Dr. Timothy Fong, a psychiatry professor and co-director of the Gambling Studies Program at the University of California Los Angeles, said enticements and promotions have been "going on since the dawn of regulated gambling."

But the introduction of AI and its ability to predict and analyze user patterns raise what he described as a dark question.

"If they are scrubbing AI platforms to find the [users] who are clearly vulnerable, who are already addicted or going to become addicted ... that would be a tremendous violation of the spirit of business," Fong said. "Are they using software deliberately to find those ones who are vulnerable and exploit them?"

AI and machine learning could be used for good, Fong added, if gambling companies identify users with alarming betting habits and help mitigate addiction or cut them off.

DraftKings is already defending a number of lawsuits related to illegal gaming offerings, or misleading and addictive products, as well as a proposed class action lawsuit filed in a federal district court in Pennsylvania in April. The Pennsylvania lawsuit alleges that DraftKings targeted users with gambling addictions through its VIP program and misleading promotions.

Mark Gottlieb, executive director of Northeastern University's Public Health Advocacy Institute, compared the mounting lawsuits to the pushback against tobacco companies in the 1990s, which resulted in policy changes at the state and federal levels.

"This is exactly what we are beginning to see with DraftKings and others in the online gambling industry" Gottlieb said. "Their conduct is coming to light and the resulting wave of litigation will soon provide a level of transparency needed to make these products safer for the public."

The lawsuit asks the court to certify a class action, award damages, require DraftKings to return money obtained through these practices, and order a stop to the use of AI models to target users and encourage them to gamble more.

The first national school choice scholarship program, the Federal Scholarship Tax Credit, will launch Jan. 1, establishing a taxpayer-funded incentive for families to choose private or homeschooling in participating states.

National school choice starts in 2027

Scholarships will be offered to students in at least 30 states

By Bianca Vázquez Toness
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Nearly all schoolchildren in at least 30 states can apply for a new federal scholarship next year to help pay for private school, homeschooling, and other educational expenses, according to regulations proposed Thursday by the Trump administration.

The first national school choice scholarship program, the Federal Scholarship Tax Credit, will launch Jan. 1, establishing a taxpayer-funded incentive for families to choose private or homeschooling in participating states. Taxpayers who donate to an organization passing out the scholarships will receive a federal tax credit, a perk expected to further fuel the conservative school choice movement.

About 96 percent of children in those states should be eligible, according to the department. Children attending public schools could use the scholarships for extra learning expenses.

“Education freedom is the key to unlocking opportunity and success for our next generation of students,” said US Secretary of Education Linda McMahon in a statement issued Thursday. The federal scholarship program, she said, will ensure “every child has access to the education they need, not one limited by ZIP code, family income, or government-imposed barriers.”

School choice scholarships have been available for decades in conservative-led states and throughout the South, giving individual students taxpayer-funded grants ranging from a couple thousand dollars to more than $30,000 a year. In places where they are available to all students regardless of income, such as Florida and Arizona, the majority of students using the money were already in private or home school or were from affluent neighborhoods, an analysis by the Associated Press showed.

The federal program departs from most state programs by not forcing students to leave public school to qualify for a scholarship. Public school students could use the money for tutoring or special education therapies, although the Republican administration has not provided specific criteria for eligible expenses yet.

Regulators say they have set up the program in a way that will make it easier for poor students to apply, proposing to let students use proof of participation in a government assistance program in lieu of providing income documentation. Foster children would not have to provide any income verification when they apply, officials said.

Experiences with school choice scholarships in other states have shown barriers to using the programs go beyond paperwork. Many families often do not know scholarship programs exist. Federal officials have not said how they would tell taxpayers and students about the scholarships.

US Secretary of Education Linda McMahon, pictured above greeting President Trump in August, said, “Education freedom is the key to unlocking opportunity and success for our next generation of students.”

Taxpayers will have the chance to donate to a scholarship program in a participating state, even if they do not live there, starting Jan. 1. Individuals can donate up to $1,700 and receive a federal tax credit for the same amount in exchange. Federal officials propose a couple filing jointly could give as much as double that amount.

Scholarship recipients could use their funding to pay for religious or private school tuition, homeschooling costs, tutoring and special education therapies, books, computers and other expenses connected to enrollment or attendance, according to officials at the Treasury Department.

States could not turn to laws or regulations to narrow the uses for the scholarships or the type of organization that can grant them, federal officials said.

But states can choose whether to participate in the program.

According to the most recent Treasury Department list, as of mid-September these states are in for 2027: Alabama, Alaska, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Carolina, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Virginia, West Virginia, and Wyoming.

Governors from Arizona, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Oregon have said their states will not join, with some arguing these programs divert resources from public schools.

More than two dozen states have yet to say what they will do. In New York, Democratic Governor Kathy Hochul has been supportive, and the state is expected to sign up.

In Massachusetts — a state with historically robust public school funding, caps on charter school expansion, and no taxpayer funding for private school tuition — education advocates on both sides are lobbying the governor to take a stand and pushing the public to register their opinion.

The state’s association of school superintendents opposes the idea that districts should take advantage of the program by creating their own nonprofits to accept donations and distribute scholarships. Many big city school districts around the country already have their own foundations. In Massachusetts, where every municipality has its own district, the majority of the more than 300 school systems have no such entity.

“Districts face a significant disadvantage compared to the private school networks that already have elaborate fundraising and scholarship infrastructure in place,” reads the Massachusetts Association of School Superintendents’ position paper. The group said requiring families to apply for scholarships and, in many cases, prove income eligibility were “bureaucratic hurdles that will certainly leave behind our most vulnerable families.”

On the other side, former Boston City Councilor and former public schoolteacher Annissa Essaibi George has argued Boston Public Schools faces severe budget shortfalls and needs new streams of income.

And besides, she argued in an op-ed published in the Dorchester Reporter: “Massachusetts taxpayers will be eligible to take advantage of this program whether the governor opts in or not. The only question is whether those dollars come back to Massachusetts children, or instead flow to students in states that moved faster.”

In just a few years, after donations from taxpayers pick up, the IRS and the Treasury Department predict the program will direct nearly $26 billion into as many 2.2 million scholarships each year.

The federal tax-credit scholarship program was signed into law last year by President Trump as part of his signature tax breaks and spending cuts bill. The public has 60 days to comment on the Treasury Department’s proposed regulations.

Most American children are being auto-enrolled in Trump accounts

By Tara Siegel Bernard and Claire Cain Miller
NEW YORK TIMES

Nearly every child in America now has a new savings account with their name on it, as well as someone else’s: President Trump’s.

The Treasury Department said Thursday that it automatically enrolled more than 60 million children into Trump accounts, the tax-deferred savings vehicles also called 530A accounts that were introduced in July.

The 530A accounts are essentially starter individual retirement accounts: Parents, guardians, and others can contribute up to $5,000 annually. But other relatives, employers, philanthropists, governments, and charitable groups can also make deposits, which grow tax-deferred in an ultralow-cost stock index fund.

Once all children have accounts, the hope is that nonprofits and government donors will be more likely to make contributions.

If you have children under 18, they probably have one now, too.

The Treasury Department created Trump accounts for all eligible children who didn’t already have one — or those who have Social Security numbers and who will not have turned 18 before the end of the calendar year.

Before this week, parents or guardians had to sign up their children completely on their own. Though more than 7 million children had been enrolled as of late July, that represents only about 10 percent of all eligible American children. Just 5 percent of low-income families had opened 530A accounts for their children, according to a survey by Commonwealth, a nonprofit.

Automatic enrollment removes that hurdle, putting every eligible child in a position to receive the widely publicized free contributions from philanthropists, charitable organizations, and governments, all of which Trump accounts are permitted to collect.

“The research was overwhelmingly clear that auto enrollment is the way to get to full participation, especially for low-income folks, and I think Treasury listened,” said Ray Boshara, a senior policy adviser at Washington University in St. Louis who has helped policymakers in both parties develop plans for children’s savings accounts.

Parents and guardians do not need to do anything to claim contributions from philanthropic groups. With an open account, children can automatically capture anything they may be eligible for.

But parents will need to claim the account to make their own deposits and to receive matching contributions for employers. During that process, they must also elect to receive the federal government’s seed deposit of $1,000 for eligible children born in 2025 through 2028.

They can do that through the Trump account mobile app. During that process, parents or guardians must verify their identity, confirm their relationship to the child, review their child’s information, and accept the account terms, a Treasury spokesperson said.

Many financial experts say that all children can benefit from a 530A account, simply because it serves as a collection basket to receive free money. But not every household should contribute to one.

Trump (or 530A) accounts are essentially individual retirement accounts — and squirreling away money for your children’s retirement usually ranks low on the hierarchy of savings needs when there are so many other goals that should be prioritized first: emergency funds, paying down debt, saving for your own retirement, and your children’s college. There are already a variety of accounts that are more flexible and tailored for many of those purposes.

The Trump administration has highlighted the large balances that can materialize after many years with a fully funded account, but most American families don’t have the wherewithal to contribute that much.

Individuals can contribute up to $5,000 a year, and employers can contribute up to $2,500, which counts toward that annual cap. But eligible government and philanthropic contributions can be made without limit and do not apply to the annual ceiling.

The Treasury Department’s rules say it will continue to periodically auto enroll children, so most parents and guardians won’t need to open the accounts on their own — they will still need, however, to claim their children’s accounts.

If the rare need arises, parents and guardians can enroll their children through the mobile app, the web page, or through IRS Form 4547, the Treasury rules say.

The Social Security Administration said in July that it would enroll newborns in the accounts when new parents requested a Social Security number — and the Treasury Department will continue to work with the agency on that, according to a Treasury spokesperson.

These are individual accounts: Contributions are received and recorded by the individual account, but the money is invested collectively through a master group trust, the regulations said. Each account holds an interest in that trust, without disclosing taxpayer information, according to a Treasury Department spokesman.

This week, the IRS issued temporary rules that accelerates that process to adopt 530A accounts into the tax code, while also proposing final rules that allows the public to comment.

The accounts are estimated to cost just over $15 billion in taxes through 2034, according to estimates from the Joint Committee on Taxation.

schools in New England and beyond — including public universities in neighboring Maine, Massachusetts, and Vermont — as they work to address the sticker shock that leads many prospective students to question the value of postsecondary education.

Some private institutions in New Hampshire have comparable programs in place. Saint Anselm College offers free tuition to residents of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont whose families earn $100,000 or less. Franklin Pierce University does likewise for residents of New Hampshire, Vermont, and Massachusetts. Dartmouth, meanwhile, touts a “Zero Parent Contribution Initiative” for families earning less than $125,000 per year.

The median household income is about $100,000 in New Hampshire, according to the US Census Bureau.

Phillip Levine, an economics professor at Wellesley College (which offers free tuition to families making $200,000 or less), recently took a closer look at the proliferation of free tuition policies. He concluded such changes are often smaller than they seem at first blush, since many students with low and moderate incomes already qualified for substantial financial aid without free tuition. Still, the policies may be useful, he said.

“Even if these programs don’t reduce the net price of college much,” Levine wrote in a research report for the Brookings Institution, “they have value if they communicate affordability in a way prospective students and their families can easily understand.”

The newly announced New Hampshire Promise program will replace the Granite Guarantee, which was established in 2017 for students who qualified for a federal Pell Grant. The state’s existing program covered the remaining cost of in-state tuition after other sources of financial aid were applied. But leaders have long felt it was underutilized.

A spokesperson, Tania DeLuzuriaga, said university leaders hope basing the new program’s criteria on family income will be more straightforward than the Pell-based eligibility, leading to greater participation. After admitting an average of roughly 900 to 1,000 students per year under the Granite Guarantee, the university system expects to admit roughly 1,200 students per year under the New Hampshire Promise, she said.

In-state tuition for the 2026-2027 academic year is about $12,300 at Keene State College, $15,400 at Plymouth State University, and $16,300 at the University of New Hampshire. Out-of-state students may pay more than twice as much. (Students have many obligatory costs besides tuition, including food, housing, books, fees, and more.)

The New Hampshire Promise will be available to income-eligible full-time first-year students and transfer students who graduated from a New Hampshire community college, officials said. There isn’t a separate application process. Admitted students who submit a Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA) will be considered automatically.

In a statement, Governor Kelly Ayotte heralded the program as an investment in students and the state’s future.

“By expanding affordable pathways to higher education, we’re creating more opportunities for our young people to pursue good-paying jobs and making it easier for them to build their careers in New Hampshire,” she said.

‘I’m not making decisions and we’re not going to make decisions. We are employees.’

WILLSON CONTRERAS, Red Sox first baseman

Contreras critical of reliance on analytics

By Alex Speier
GLOBE STAFF

NEW YORK — For the Red Sox, the playoffs had barely begun by the time the Yankees delivered a sledgehammer of shattering finality.
In two games, the Sox were out-scored, 18-2, in the most lopsided Wild Card Series in the brief history of the best-of-three format. Their 9-0 blank-ing at the hands of Cam Schlitler and the Yankees in Game 1 was followed by a 9-2 slobberknocking in Game 2 that spelled the end of the series and the season.

How to make sense of the shellacking?
“It’s a good question. It’s different for everybody,” said Trevor Story. “You work your [butt] off all year, all offseason, and you get to this point, and this is what we play for. You play to win in the postseason, and to have it end [in Yankee Stadium] two times in a row is tough, and everyone will process that differently.”

For some players, there was appreciation of the zombie-like midyear return from the dead, a 15-game winning streak and 32-5 stretch unlike anything that most of the players had experienced. Yet the traces of those summer memories were clouded by the thrashing they’d just endured.

The Sox hit .117 (7 for 60) — the second-worst average by any team in any playoff series. Their .159 on-base percentage was the lowest. They barely had any runners in scoring position in the two games, and when they did, they literally did nothing, going 0 for 3 with nary a base runner.

Willson Contreras was in little mood for silver linings. At 34, he is their elder statesperson among position players. He was the team’s best hitter this year, hitting .275/.386/.516 with career highs in on-base and home runs (27). He is an influential clubhouse voice.

Tracy blundered by pulling plug early

NEW YORK — Two final baseball nights in the Bronx saw the Red Sox get out-done by the Yankees in just about every way imaginable, swept out of the American League Wild Card Series by a team that hit the ball farther, pitched the ball harder, and fielded the ball cleaner.

And one more thing: managed the game better.
Perhaps that’s unfair to Red Sox first-year manager Chad Tracy, but the truth hurts. Between the obvious mistake in pulling his starting pitchers too early in both games of the series and the clear overreliance on the analytics that led him to do so, Tracy — such a feel-good story across this comeback season — turned into a pumpkin just in time for the calendar to flip to October.
As the ugly accounting of back-to-back losses by a combined 18-2 score is completed, the manager’s inexperience has to be included. For a first-time major league manager who had never actually managed a game he HAD to win before Wednesday night’s elimination, his decisions, particularly when it came to pitching, backfired in repeated and spectacular fashion.
The head-scratcher from the 9-2 season-ending loss was the removal of starter Sonny Gray with two outs in the top of the fifth inning, a decision based largely in the desire to avoid having the veteran righthander face the Yankees a third time through the order.
Gray, the AL’s leader in wins with an 18-5 record and a 2.72 ERA, had thrown only 70 pitches, and his own clipped words inside a muted post-game locker room left no doubt about how he felt about the decision.
“I think I am the best pitcher in the American League going through the order the third time. I think that’s a fact,” he said. “Yeah, I mean I would have liked to live or die with me in that moment,”

No Gonzalez as Patriots prep for Bills

By Christopher Price

FOXBOROUGH — Cornerback Christian Gonzalez, who has been the Patriots’ most effective defensive player through the first three weeks of the season, missed his second straight practice Thursday, throwing his availability for Sunday’s road game against the Bills into question.
Gonzalez is dealing what the team is calling a shoulder issue. He walked through the locker room during media availability without a wrap or sling on his shoulder.
The 6-foot-1-inch, 205-pounder, who signed a record-breaking contract just prior to the start of the season, has started the year on an excellent note. In the opening loss to the Seahawks while working against Jaxon Smith-Njigba, Gonzalez yielded one catch for 4 yards on five targets while recording two pass breakups. In a Week 2 win over

RICHARD PARK, N.Y.
Bill Farmer of Rochester stood against the chain link fence, staring at the giant hole in the ground at 1 Bills Drive. For 53 seasons and 429 games, this was the site of the Bills’ home stadium, a mecca of memories for western New Yorkers. Now it sits as an empty construction site after the stadium was demolished this summer.
“It looks like the future site of parking lots or some shopping,” said Farmer, a Boston native who says he has been a Bills season ticket-holder for 20 years. “It’s pretty sad. But then again, this is pretty happy.”

He points across Abbott Road to 1 Bills Plaza, where the team’s sparkling new, $2.2 billion Highmark Stadium is about to host its first real game, the Bills’ 41-31 win over the Lions on Sept. 17. Leaving the old Highmark Stadium is bittersweet for millions of Bills fans, but the excitement over finally having their own modern football palace after five decades at the old building is overwhelming.
The Patriots went 32-21 at the old building, formerly known as Rich Stadium and Ralph Wilson Stadium. Their first game at the new stadium is Sunday at 1 p.m.

McDaniels: Maye ‘dinged’ shoulder in loss

By Nicole Yang
GLOBE STAFF

Patriots quarterback Drake Maye “dinged” his shoulder against the Jaguars last Sunday, prompting his addition to the injury report, offensive coordinator Josh McDaniels said Thursday.

“He ran the ball a few times last week,” McDaniels said. “I think that’s when it happened.”

The Patriots on Wednesday and Thursday listed Maye as a full participant with a right (throwing) shoulder injury. McDaniels said the injury has not impacted his play-calling during games or practices.

“They would obviously tell me if there was something that we felt like we couldn’t do or he couldn’t do,” McDaniels said. “That has not been the case. I know he’s a tough kid. I know that for sure. He doesn’t make a big deal out of much.”

Against the Jaguars, Maye registered four carries — two as scrambles, one as a designed run, and one as a quarterback sneak. He also was sacked twice. It’s not immediately obvious when his shoulder got banged up.

One possibility is the designed run at the end of the first half, when Jaguars defensive end Josh Hines-Allen made a strong tackle with Maye landing hard on his right shoulder. But Maye didn’t appear noticeably shaken up on the play, or any throughout the game. He stayed in until the Jaguars extended their lead to 35-6 midway through the fourth quarter.

“He’s always been a guy that can run and do things with his legs and all that,” McDaniels said. “He’s taken a few hits since he’s been in the National Football League. That’s, I think, part of the process when you can make things happen with your legs. You’re going to incur some hits.”

After the game, Maye answered two questions about his shoulder.

Asked if there are still lingering effects from the injury he suffered in the AFC Championship game in January, Maye would not answer definitively.

“I like to say when you have that much time off and you get to focus on getting back, that you’re going out there healthy,” he said. “You know you’re going to get banged up every now and then, but at the same time, a lot of guys are banged up.”

Asked if his shoulder feels as good as it did before that injury, Maye said, “I wouldn’t say there’s a problem with my shoulder.”

Coach Mike Vrabel on Monday said, to his knowledge, Maye’s shoulder is not experiencing issues that would require treatment or land him on the injury report.

“I don’t anticipate that being any issue going forward,” Vrabel said.

Maye also clarified Wednesday his shoulder is not impacting his ability to throw the football.

To then see the team add Maye to the injury report was somewhat of a surprise. Before McDaniels spoke on Thursday, it was unclear if the issue was still related to the injury Maye suffered in the AFC Championship.

In the week leading up to the Super Bowl, Maye said on multiple occasions that his shoulder was “feeling good. He participated in a limited capacity for one practice. In the aftermath of the loss to the Seahawks, Maye revealed he received a pain-relieving shot before kickoff but said he doesn’t believe the injury affected his play.

In the weeks following the Super Bowl, Maye said the injury would not require surgery. He later said the shoulder “shouldn’t be an issue” for the 2026 season.

Maye’s shoulder was not much of a talking point throughout training camp but recently became one amid his glaringly poor start.

Vrabel is scheduled to speak next on Friday afternoon.

Watson, Szmyt cap Browns’ win

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Deshaun Watson passed for 268 yards and moved the Browns into position for Andre Szmyt’s career-long 56-yard field goal with 10 seconds remaining that gave host Cleveland a 27-24 win over the Pittsburgh Steelers on Thursday night.

Watson, who completed 24 of 33 passes with a touchdown and interception, was 4 of 5 for 46 yards as he led a go-ahead drive in the fourth quarter for the third straight week.

The Browns — who are 3-1 for the first time since 2021 — had a 21-7 lead late in the first half before the Steelers rallied to tie it at 24-all. Aaron Rodgers threw a 3-yard touchdown pass to Pat Freiermuth with 1:44 remaining and Rodgers sneaked it in for the 2-point conversion.

Rodgers, who was 22 of 40 for 299 yards with three touchdowns and two interceptions, had one final chance to get the Steelers in field goal range, but was picked off by Grant Delpit at the Browns 18 with 1 second left.

The Steelers’ Jaylen Warren rushed for 93 yards on 17 carries and DK Metcalf had five catches for 115 yards.

The Browns’ defense sacked Rodgers five times.

Daniels: ‘Day by day’

Commanders quarterback Jayden Daniels said he has no concerns about re-injuring his left elbow and is “taking it day by day” on the possibility of starting against the Colts on Sunday at Tottenham Hotspur Stadium in London.

Daniels, who dislocated his elbow in Week 2 against the Cowboys, said he didn’t need immediate surgery and wanted to show leadership by returning to help his team.

Daniels missed last Sunday’s game against the Seahawks. Marcus Mariota threw three touchdown passes in the 33-31 win over the Super Bowl champions.

Head coach Dan Quinn said Wednesday Daniels would get more reps as the week progressed and that by Friday “we’ll have a definite determination of where we’re at.”

McConkey misses practice

Chargers wide receiver Ladd McConkey missed practice Thursday because of a foot injury.

McConkey was downgraded after practicing on a limited basis Wednesday, putting his status to play at the Seahawks on Sunday in doubt.

McConkey leads the Chargers (0-3) with 12 receptions for 183 yards with one touchdown through three games. He had 82 receptions for 1,149 yards and seven touchdowns as a rookie, and had reasserted himself this season as the top option in the passing game for quarterback Justin Herbert following a drop in production in 2025.

Etienne placed on IR

Saints running back Travis Etienne Jr. is being placed on injured reserve, coach Kellen Moore announced. The move means Etienne, who pulled a hamstring during the third quarter of Sunday’s 35-27 loss to the Raiders, will miss a minimum of four games. His earliest possible return would come against the Browns on Nov. 8. . . . NFL commissioner Roger Goodell met with Governor JB Pritzker of Illinois and the leadership of the state’s General Assembly, adding another wrinkle to the Bears’ long-running pursuit of a new home. The Bears said in August that the franchise’s “sole focus” for the construction of a new stadium and mixed-use development was on Hammond, Ind. But the public confirmation of the conversation between Goodell and Pritzker indicates that Illinois remains in the mix.

Christian Gonzalez said he was “good” after Sunday’s loss, but he has missed two practices since.

and you try to prepare them. Just like we tell them every week: prepare like starters, and then they get their opportunity to go, make the most of it.”

The Patriots have struggled with injury on both sides of the ball through the season’s first month. Wide receiver A.J. Brown, offensive linemen Mike Onwenu and Greg Van Roten, outside linebackers Harold Landry and Dre’Mont Jones, and safety Craig Woodson have all missed at least one game.

Gonzalez is one of four players who did not practice Thursday. That group also included fullback Reggie Gilliam (knee), right tackle Morgan Moses (foot), and defensive tackle Christian Barmore (shoulder). Six players were limited, including Woodson (shoulder) and Jones (shoulder), while quarterback Drake Maye (shoulder) was a full participant.

Asked about the injury situation, Kuhr said it’s just another week in the NFL.

“I don’t really see it as challenging,” he said. “It’s just another week that we’ve got to find a solution to whatever the problem of the week is. And I get excited for that. I think the staff gets excited [for that].

“At the end of the day, whoever’s out there, obviously we trust, and [we have] to find some creative ways to make sure they’re in the best position possible for their skill set.”

Buffalo’s sparkling football palace a long time coming

stadiums being built — Gillette Stadium, MetLife, SoFi, Jerry World. To have one here in Buffalo, it’s quite a moment. This stadium makes you feel like you’re on the map.”

The new Highmark was built with $850 million in public funds, and is a glorious shrine to Bills football. Sight lines are magnificent, as the seating bowl was built more vertically than horizontally. The concourse goes 360 degrees around the stadium and is open-air throughout, allowing fans to still watch the game while they buy concessions. The stadium is outdoors to maintain the Bills’ frigid home-field advantage but was built with a roof covering approximately 65 percent of seats. Though the Bills reduced capacity by about 10,000 seats to 60,000, the smallest in the NFL, the stadium is loud, with the crowd roar bouncing off the roof and concrete walls.

“It still doesn’t feel real yet,” Bills tight end Dawson Knox said. “It’s the coolest place I’ve ever played football in. There’s going to be some incredible memories to be made here in the near future.”

The stadium is also filled with homages to the team’s history and fans, such as banners commemorating the team’s AFL championships in 1964 and ‘65, or their “Perfect Game” against the Patriots in January 2022, or a replica broken folding table in the concourse. The Bills also insisted on installing natural grass for the first time in their history.

Most importantly, it’s directly across the street from the old stadium, allowing the fans to maintain many of their game-day traditions — they park in the same neighbors’ yards, tailgate in their favorite spots, and drink at their favorite bars in Orchard Park.

“The thing they did the best, the most important thing is the football game,” former Bills quarterback Ryan Fitzpatrick said. “Being across the street from the old site, they kept a lot of the wonderful things that are important for the Buffalo community, and so I think in the end it’s going to be a huge positive for them.”

The new Highmark also represents something bigger for western New Yorkers — stability. As one NFL official noted on Opening Night, the stadium is the result of a 20-year effort to get the Bills a new home. It wasn’t long ago that the Bills struggled to sell out, and moved one home game per year to Toronto from 2008-13. When former owner Ralph Wilson died in 2014, there was worry of a new owner moving the team out of the NFL’s second-smallest market.

Instead, Sabres owner Terry Pegula bought the Bills, maintaining local ties. Then in 2018 they drafted Josh Allen, who has become the patron saint of Bills football. And in 2024 they finally got funding for their new stadium, cementing the Bills’ presence in western New York.

“It’s been decades that that’s been hanging over this region, and now that’s gone,” Tasker said. “It’s the final stamp of permanency that has been missing since Ralph reached the age of 80.”

Of course, the new digs come with mixed emotions. The old stadium had charm — it was a concrete eyesore, but it was their concrete eyesore, the perfect embodiment of western New York’s blue-collar spirit. Since 1973, multiple generations of fans watched their heroes play at the old building, from O.J. Simpson to Joe Ferguson to Jim Kelly to Doug Flutie to Allen. The Bills went 247-163 at the old Highmark, plus a 16-3 mark in the playoffs.

The Bills have not announced what they are going to do with the giant hole in the ground where the old stadium used to sit. There are rumors of commercial development, potentially in the same vein as Patriot Place, but it’s all theoretical for now.

“I was happy with the old stadium. I didn’t need a new one,” said Chele Illig, a 40-year season ticket-holder from Cattaraugus. “But I’m nostalgic. It’s usually the younger people who think you’ve got to have the newest and the latest.”

Illig also said her tickets increased by about one-third with the move to the new stadium, highlighting an even bigger concern — the Bills pricing out many of their fans. Buffalo is decidedly more working class than most NFL cities. Yet not only did the Bills raise ticket prices, some by as much as double the amount, but also sold personal seat licenses ranging from $750 to $50,000.

The Bills are hardly the only team to price out many of its ardent fans, though, and the demand for tickets was clearly there. The Bills hoped to raise $225 million through PSLs, yet reportedly generated $264 million to help offset the cost of construction. The Bills also used an all-local construction crew, bolstering the notion that the stadium is by western New York, for western

New York.

“A huge part of it was the people that were constructing and putting the stadium together were people from Buffalo. They kept that in mind the whole time they did it,” Fitzpatrick said. “I think once the fans get over the sticker shock of the PSLs and things, it’s going to be a wonderful place to watch a football game.”

As much as the fans loved the old Highmark, many also believe it was cursed. The Bills still have not won a Super Bowl, losing four straight in the 1990s, and have suffered heartbreak after heartbreak in recent years with Allen.

Now it’s time to make new memories in their new Highmark Stadium.

“All the superstition, everybody’s going crazy with that stuff. ‘This is the first year we’re going to win the Super Bowl, the curse of the old place is going to be lifted,’ the whole thing,” Tasker said. “It’s like cheering almost for a different team, because that stadium was so much a part of the team’s identity. Now we have to get used to this place feeling like home.”

BC overly dependent on McKenzie's rushes

By Trevor Hass
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Four weeks into the season, Boston College quarterback Mason McKenzie has the 12th-most rushing attempts in the nation and second-most among quarterbacks with 74.

McKenzie's 26-carry game against Virginia Tech was somewhat of an outlier because of the weather. At the same time, it illuminated a larger issue that the BC offense needs more variety and unpredictability.

The Eagles (2-2, 0-1 Atlantic Coast Conference) have the lowest-scoring offense in the ACC at 19.8 points per game. They are also second to last in completion percentage (56.5) and third to last in passing yards (759).

When they face No. 21 Southern Methodist at Gerald J. Ford Stadium on Saturday at noon, they will need to prove they can keep pace with a high-powered offense. Familiar foe Kevin Jennings has the second-most passing yards in the nation (1,453), so winning a low-scoring game against the Mustangs (3-1, 1-1) seems like less of a possibility.

“We have to be better offensively,” said BC coach Bill O’Brien. “We know that. We’re working hard together to really try and improve it, whether it’s schematically or techniques or maybe different players, whatever it is. We’re all in it together.”

The Eagles have talent at running back with Evan Dickens and Bo MacCormack, but they combined for 11 carries for 13 yards last Saturday and couldn’t create separation against a formidable Hokies front seven.

BC’s offensive line has shown flashes but has been inconsistent at times. Tackle Kristian Phillips has emerged as a leader, yet a lack of protection in spurts has forced McKenzie to read and react and simply take off rather than look downfield.

gles with 13 receptions. Dawson Pough, Johnathan Montague Jr., and Landon Wright have displayed their speed in flashes, yet BC’s lack of a true go-to target like Lewis Bond or Reed Harris is easy to spot. Jaedn Skeete and Reed Swanson, preseason contenders to lead the team in catches, have combined for five.

McKenzie’s elusiveness is a double-edged sword. The Eagles appear content letting him lean on his creativity and shiftiness, but they have to avoid automatically defaulting to their most reliable option.

“Learning how to play with Mason is definitely different,” said tight end Zeke Moore. “When to block, when to stay open, how to get open, it’s a lot

Ten years on, Tatum leads way for Celtics

By Adam Himmelsbach
GLOBE STAFF

In 2017, the Celtics held training camp in Newport, R.I. The sparkling new Auerbach Center in Brighton was a year away from opening, so the trip was a way to escape the team’s rundown practice facility in the back of a Waltham health club and promote team bonding.

It was also Jayson Tatum’s rookie year, and the superstar forward can hardly believe a decade has passed since then.

“I just kind of remember it like it was yesterday,” Tatum said before Thursday’s practice. “It’s hard to imagine it’s already my 10th one. Just trying to stay present more than anything, because obviously I know how fast it’s going by. Just trying to enjoy it.”

At the time, Tatum was a shy, greenhorn prospect from Duke trying to find his way on a roster that included All-Star talents such as Kyrie Irving and Al Horford.

Tatum has experienced so much since then. He is a four-time first-team All-NBA selection, he has his own signature sneaker — along with countless other endorsements — and he helped the Celtics win the 2024 NBA title.

But one of his most defining moments was also one he would like to forget. On May 12, 2025, he tore his Achilles in Game 4 of the conference semifinal series against the Knicks, and he wondered then if he would ever be the same.

He returned last March and showed glimpses of his All-Star form, but there were potholes to navigate. On his first dunk attempt, he was blocked by the rim because he did not have the necessary burst. After long stretches, he was much more winded than usual. And the speed of the game was initially jarring.

“I was cleared, but mentally, from a conditioning standpoint, I wasn’t myself,” Tatum said. “I think for me when I came back, it was great from a mentality standpoint to get over that hurdle of playing and even if I was at 80 percent of myself, knowing that I could still be effective.”

Throughout, Tatum said those games were part of his rehab process. And that process continued this summer, when Tatum was able to attack and truly get his swagger back and push forward without reluctance or limitation.

“Just going into the offseason knowing that I had the whole summer to get my body right and get the rhythm of playing basketball again, I feel so much more confident from a mental standpoint and physically than I did last March,” he said. “That’s how it should be. It’s a long journey from the injury I had, and I feel great.”

So, he enters his 10th NBA season with a new appreciation and a new perspective. The 28-year-old will never be an in-your-face presence with his teammates, but he understands he is now, believe it or not, one of the older veterans. He is also one of the best basketball players in the world. And he is eager to take on more responsibilities as a leader.

Tatum has said that there are different ways to lead, and he provided an example this summer, when he organized informal workouts in Los Angeles with teammates. They played basketball and golf. They shared meals and started building the cohesion they believe will help them remain an Eastern Conference force, all at Tatum’s urging.

“It had to do with the new guys on our team and with the rookies,” he said. “And, I don’t know, just trying something new. It’s kind of like the first time we’ve ever done that since I’ve been here. Getting in the gym in the summertime when we normally wouldn’t be around each other and play some golf and just hang out, just kind of build that chemistry.”

BRUINS NOTEBOOK

Clifton thrives with increased time on ice

By Conor Ryan
BOSTON.COM

Connor Clifton didn’t think twice when the Bruins came calling on July 1.

Beyond his familiarity with Boston — having played parts of five seasons and 232 games with the Bruins — the free agent defenseman also felt his former club would offer an opportunity to earn steady playing time.

Despite playing just 50 games with the Penguins last season, the 31-year-old Clifton felt he had more to give with a team in need along the blue line.

Clifton’s hopes of securing a greater role with Boston were validated in the season-opening win over the Rangers on Tuesday, as he recorded a team-leading 23:23 of ice time.

The Quinnpiac product has logged more than 23:23 just nine times in his 435 career NHL games.

“I was a little sore, but excited,” Clifton said of his heavy workload. “That first game you’re always a little sore. You’re kind of juiced up to get at it, and a little nervous.”

With Charlie McAvoy serving a six-game suspension, coach Marco Sturm has had to reshuffle his defense corps to properly allocate the heavy minutes McAvoy usually commands.

Clifton and Nikita Zadorov were the beneficiaries on Tuesday, with Sturm relying heavily on a duo that can dish out hits, ferry pucks through the neutral zone, and activate offensively.

“I think Cliffy is healthy for Z,” Sturm said Thursday. “Z sometimes has a big mouth, and Cliffy settles him down, too. So, it’s a good combo . . . I trust them. They played a lot of minutes the other night. It’s not going to be like this every night, but they showed me they can play against the big boys, too.”

Clifton said he was surprised by how fleet-footed the 6-foot-7-inch, 244-pound Zadorov can be. But that mobility should come in handy for a defense corps that needs to limit how much time it spends around goalies Jeremy Swayman or Michael DiPietro.

Swayman (24 saves) was the main equalizer in the 3-0 shutout of the Rangers.

But Clifton — donning the spoked-B in a game that mattered for the first time in 1,250 days — was pleased with how Boston’s shorthanded defensive unit fared after an abbreviated training camp.

“I think we played to our identity,” he said. A couple big hits by [Zadorov], so it was great. I think we were reading each other well.”

‘A’ huge honor

Plenty of eyes were on David Pastrnak’s sweater alteration for the season opener, with the veteran winger drawing an ovation from the TD Garden crowd after being introduced as captain for the first time.

But scrappy winger Tanner Jeannot also had some changes to his gear — skating with an “A” on his sweater as one of Boston’s alternate captains alongside Hampus Lindholm.

Team president Cam Neely singled out the pugnacious forward as one of the emerging leaders in a re-worked dressing room anchored by Pastrnak and McAvoy — alongside Lindholm, Zadorov, Morgan Geekie, and Fraser Minten.

“It’s obviously a huge honor,” Jeannot said. “To be able to wear that on my sweater on an Original Six team, it’s a dream come true. I just want to do everything I can to help the guys, help the team win, whatever that needs to be. If that’s making hits, blocking shots, getting to the net, going to the hard areas, I just want to help out.”

Poitras back at practice

Matt Poitras returned to practice in a regular sweater but did not take part in line rushes.

The center was placed on injured reserve to start the season, with Sturm undecided if Poitras would make the trip to Winnipeg and Minnesota. A return for Poitras might not be in the cards until at least next week, considering Sturm wants him to get a few more practices under his belt.

HIGH SCHOOL FOOTBALL ROUNDUP

Billerica’s patience pays off in OT win

By Nate Weitzer
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

As the seconds ticked down in regulation during a fierce Merrimack Valley Conference battle at North Andover, visiting Billerica never panicked.

Trailing by a field goal, the Indians stuck with the double-wing rushing attack that has become the program’s identity, working the ball methodically into Scarlet Knights’ territory before burning their final timeout.

Billerica didn’t need to get into the end zone, because senior Danny Venezia drilled a 32-yard kick that would’ve been good from 50-plus yards, forcing overtime, where Billerica prevailed, 26-20.

“There were people kind of looking at me sideways,” Billerica coach Shawn Theriault said after running the ball consistently in the final two minutes. “But I was thinking if we could just pound it and get to around the 20-yard line, Danny was good.”

Venezia added 119 rushing yards, including a 56-yard touchdown, but fumbled in the first half to give No. 17 North Andover (3-1) a lifeline. The Scarlet Knights struggled to stop Billerica’s rushing attack with road graders Prince Mahey, Thomas Arsenault, Jason Leipow, William Marshall, and Nicholas Cloutier blocking up front.

“The kids pride themselves on toughness,” Theriault said. “They’re Billerica kids. So they get excited when we call for the double wing.”

Billerica (4-0) forced a fourth-down fumble to open the overtime, then Jackson Gearin (13 carries, 76 yards) showcased his toughness by pushing the pile into the end zone for the clinching score, marking the program’s sixth straight conference win.

Senior quarterback Austin Allen rushed for 98 yards with electric touchdown runs of 36 and 32 yards to pace the Scarlet Knights. Allen found Jason Meaney on a 9-yard TD pass to give the hosts a 13-10 lead after three quarters.

But Erik Knight led Billerica back with a 50-yard kick return, followed by a 13-yard touchdown run, to put the Indians back in front. Allen answered with his second touchdown run, but leaving 3 minutes, 38 seconds on the clock proved too much time for Billerica to counter.

Norwell 41, Abington 14 — Explosive when it needs to be. Punishing when it wants to be.

That’s the story of the Norwell offense. Playing at South Shore rival Abington on Friday, lightning struck when senior quarterback Jack Luccarelli blazed down the right sideline for a 56-yard game-opening touchdown at Memorial Field.

Immediately after intermission, the Clippers (3-1) were malicious and measured, executing a punishing eight-minute drive that ended in a 9-yard touchdown by senior halfback Colin Gerhart.

Bruising or blazing. Fast or slow. Norwell has both gears.

“We were going fast in the first half and we saw the effect on [Abington] . . . You saw some guys with their hands on their knees,” said Norwell coach Jason Pithie. “I love going fast because our guys are in really good shape. Then, in that third quarter, we didn’t want to go fast. . . . We wanted to pound our way down the field.”

“We play Abington every year. We know them very well,” Luccarelli added. “There’s a lot of motivation coming into this game. They got us last year, and I thought this game was huge with our momentum.”

After Luccarelli’s opening-drive statement, the Green Wave (3-1) responded, with sophomore Jake Lehman powering in for a 1-yard touchdown.

Gerhart countered with a 3-yard score, and after a quick defensive stop, Luccarelli added to the Clippers’ advantage with a 3-yard TD of his own for a two-score lead. Daniel Pifer scored from 3 yards out before halftime to cut Abington’s deficit to 21-14.

Norwell’s defense forced three consecutive third-quarter stops and allowing Luccarelli to run wild. His fourth-quarter 11-yard touchdown run — then a late-game 1-yard punch-in by junior Charlie Hajjar — all but iced it.

Medford 33, Saugus 0 — Tony Corrado threw three touchdown passes and Judson Jean took a punt return 30 yards for a score as the visiting Mustangs (1-3) earned the nonleague win vs. Saugus (0-4).

Correspondent Evan Walsh reported from Abington and Ethan Kagno contributed.

Wilson, Aces bounce Fever

A’ja Wilson made sure her basketball spoke for itself Thursday night, as the four-time WNBA MVP scored 36 points to lead the defending champion Las Vegas Aces to a 94-83 victory over the Indiana Fever in the deciding Game 3 of the first round. The third-seeded Aces, who have won three of the past four titles, moved on to play the winner of the Golden State-Dallas series, which will be decided Friday night in San Francisco. This is the second year in a row Las Vegas has ended the season for Caitlin Clark and the Fever, who were seeded sixth. The teams met in the semifinals a year ago, with the Aces pulling out an overtime victory in the finale of the five-game series. Wilson bookended this series with sensational performances in Games 1 and 3, making her sure verbal confrontation with a Fever fan Tuesday in Indianapolis wouldn’t be the enduring memory. The league did not punish Wilson, who opened the series with 38 points and 16 rebounds, followed up in this game by making 11 of 18 shots and grabbing 10 rebounds. Teammate Chelsea Gray added 23 points and Jackie Young scored 18. Clark scored 11 points in the first quarter, but was held to seven the rest of the game. Kelsey Mitchell led Indiana with 23 points and Aliyah Boston had 19 points and 10 rebounds . . . Atlanta Dream star forward Angel Reese was voted WNBA Defensive Player of the Year, receiving 46 votes from 72 media members. Golden State’s Gabby Williams finished second with 20 votes and Wilson was third. Reese grabbed a league-high 12.1 rebounds a game and ranked third in the league with 1.8 steals a game . . . The UConn men’s and women’s basketball teams were each picked to win the Big East by the league’s coaches. Silas Demary Jr. and Sarah Strong were named preseason Big East Player of the Year.

Shesterkin first Rangers goalie to score

Igor Shesterkin became the 18th goaltender in NHL history to score a goal and first for the Rangers when he shot the puck into an empty net late in a 5-1 victory against the Lightning. Shesterkin was mobbed by celebrating teammates after scoring with 2:34 left. He skated to the bench at the front of the line of players to fist-bump teammates and was serenaded by chants of “Igor! Igor!” from fans delighted to see him finally cash in. The first goal of his career is the 21st by a goalie, counting the playoffs. Shesterkin was also terrific at the other end, stopping 24 of the 25 shots he faced.

Bill Draper, who started his pioneering career as a Silicon Valley investor by steering a rented Pontiac through the orchard-dotted Santa Clara Valley of Northern California in the early 1960s, drumming up business in an era when few entrepreneurs had even heard the term “venture capital,” died Sept. 8 at his home in Atherton, Calif. He was 98.

His death was confirmed by his daughter Polly Draper.

The “man who saw Silicon Valley before it existed,” as the magazine BW Businessworld recently called him, Mr. Draper began his career more than a decade before Silicon Valley acquired its name in the early 1970s, at a time when computer coding was still done using punched paper cards.

As a founder or managing director of a string of trailblazing venture capital companies, including Sutter Hill Ventures and Draper Richards, he helped start an industry worth hundreds of billions of dollars, alongside titans such as Arthur Rock, Eugene Kleiner, Thomas J. Perkins, and Don Valentine.

Known for his glass-half-full mentality, he was called Dr. Yes by his colleagues at Draper Richards because “he loved to say, ‘We’re in!’ to a deal at an initial meeting before we could do the due diligence,” Robin Richards Donohoe, the company’s cofounder, said in an interview.

His long list of wins over the decades included placing early bets on video game maker Activision, as well as Skype, OpenTable, printer company Qume, and Corbin-Farnsworth, a pioneering maker of defibrillators, pacemakers, and heart monitors.

Armed with a Harvard University MBA, Mr. Draper arrived in California in 1959 to join Draper, Gaither, and Anderson, which was cofounded by his father, William H. Draper Jr., a prominent New York investment banker, and was considered the first venture capital firm west of the Mississippi River.

“It was the only game in town,” the younger Bill Draper recalled in a 2011 oral history with the Computer History Museum in Mountain View, Calif.

The tech industry was still in its infancy, and so was its business infrastructure. In those days, the investment community “didn’t know a semiconductor from a piece of Swiss cheese,” said Jay Last, a celebrated founder of Fairchild Semiconductor who helped develop the chips that propelled the computer revolution.

In 1962, Mr. Draper partnered with his friend Franklin Pitcher Johnson Jr., known as Pitch, to start their own firm, Draper & Johnson Investment Co. At the time, the sun-dappled Santa Clara Valley, south of San Francisco, was one of the largest fruit-growing regions in the world, nicknamed the Valley of Heart’s Delight.

“It was a lot of fruit orchards in Sunnyvale, in Santa Clara and so on, and we’d go look for doors to knock on that looked like they had to do with some kind of technology or electronics,” Mr. Draper recalled in the oral history.

“We’d ask for the president,” he said, “and he’d come out, typically about our age, and he’d ask, ‘Well, what do you guys do?’ And we’d say, ‘Venture capital.’ And he’d say, ‘What?’ And then we’d explain what it was. And then he’d say, ‘Well, come on in and hear about my company.’”

Mr. Draper continued: “We became the go-to guys in the Valley. We were the kind of people that friends of friends of friends would call to ask about these various deals.”

Around 1965, he and Johnson went their separate ways. Mr. Draper joined Sutter Hill, a real estate company that, under his direction and that of Paul Wythes, another industry trailblazer, branched off into venture capital.

William Henry Draper III was born Jan. 1, 1928, in White Plains, N.Y., the youngest of three children of Katherine (Baum) Draper and William Draper, an executive at Dillon, Read & Co., a premier New York investment banking house. After World War II, his father served as undersecretary of the Army and helped coordinate the Marshall Plan.

Mr. Draper enrolled at Yale University. “I thought Harvard was a little too intellectual for me, and Princeton was a little too social,” he said. “Yale sounded right in the middle.”

He became a member of the elite Skull and Bones society and studied economics, history, and political science, earning his bachelor’s degree in 1950. During the Korean War, he served on the front lines as a second lieutenant.

He went on to attend Harvard Business School, where he studied under influential professor Georges Doriot, who advised him — as Mr. Draper recalled in a 2010 Harvard oral history — to “get out of Boston” after graduating and “get into something that’s got some muscle.”

Mr. Draper heeded the advice and took a management training position at Chicago-based Inland Steel Co., where he met Johnson, who grew up in Palo Alto and eventually persuaded him to move to California.

During the 1980s, Mr. Draper realized that his “learning curve was flattened out” in venture capital and detoured into public service, serving as president and chair of the Export-Import Bank of the United States, where he oversaw efforts to stoke exports, in part by providing financing and loans to foreign buyers of American goods.

Five years later, he took over the United Nations Development Program, overseeing about 8,000 aid workers around the world, fighting poverty, funding environmental and health programs, and promoting democracy.

During his seven years there, the agency’s programs grew in value to $1.5 billion, from $890 million. By the end, he said, “I’d been to 101 developing countries and raised money from the rich countries to give to poor countries.

His experience abroad inspired him to return to venture capital, but with an international focus. In the mid-1990s, he joined Richards Donohoe in founding Draper International, one of the first American venture capital funds to focus on companies in India.

A related domestic fund, Draper Richards, has invested in companies such as Skype, OpenTable, Selectica, and Athenahealth.

Mr. Draper later decided to apply his business experience to the nonprofit world — “venture philanthropy,” as he called it — and helped establish what became the Draper Richards Kaplan Foundation, which has funded more than 280 nonprofit and for-profit social enterprises serving some 700 million people around the world.

Over the decades, the industry that he helped create evolved almost beyond recognition as it lurched toward the era of trillion-dollar initial public offerings.

At Sutter Hill, “we had a lot of doubles and triples, and not many strikeouts,” Mr. Draper said in the Harvard interview. “That has changed because the size of the typical venture firm is so great now that they want to move the needle” — which changed the risk-reward ratio.

His wife of more than 60 years, Phyllis (Culbertson) Draper, died in 2018. In addition to their daughter Polly, he leaves another daughter, Rebecca Draper; a son, Timothy; eight grandchildren; and 13 great-grandchildren.

Venture capitalists are basically fishermen, Mr. Draper said, dropping in countless lines and never knowing when they might reel in a whopper.

For him, there was one very big fish that got away. At Sutter Hill in the 1970s, he sent a younger colleague to check out yet another tech startup.

Upon his return, the colleague told him, “Well, you know, they kept me waiting for a half an hour, and the people were pretty arrogant, and after all it’s an $18 million valuation.”

Mr. Draper recalled his reply: “‘OK,’ I said, ‘If you don’t like it, let’s turn it down.’”

Esther Rantzen, U.K. media figure

LONDON — Esther Rantzen, a British broadcaster who became a prominent voice in the recent attempt to get assisted dying legalized in the United Kingdom, has died. She was 86.

In a statement, her three children said their “adored mother” died on Wednesday. “We will always remember her endless capacity for joy, her ability to comfort every heartache, her beautiful way with words and her expert guidance in all things,” her children Miriam, Rebecca, and Joshua Wilcox said.

Over the decades, Ms. Rantzen became one of the most respected figures within British media.

She was perhaps most famous for fronting the BBC consumer affairs program “That’s Life!” for 21 years from 1973 to 1994. Over the years, the show branched out beyond consumer affairs to investigate life-and-death issues, including an investigation into how a boarding school employed pedophiles and a critique of the UK’s lack of organ donors. It could also be light-hearted, blending satire and farce with the more hard-hitting segments.

The program led her to set up Childline in 1986, a helpline for children in distress that was open 24/7 throughout the year. She later launched The Silver Line in 2012, which aimed to tackle loneliness in older people.

In later life, Ms. Rantzen became a strong proponent for assisted dying, after she was diagnosed with stage four lung cancer in 2023. She openly discussed her own plan to “buzz off to Zurich” because assisted dying is legal in Switzerland, and she criticized the “messy and cruel” law in England and Wales that would criminalize loved ones who tried to help in any endeavor to do so.

Biljana Plavsic, 96; ex-Bosnian Serb leader

BELGRADE — Former Bosnian Serb leader Biljana Plavsic, who pleaded guilty at a United Nations tribunal to persecution as a crime against humanity for her role in atrocities during the 1992-95 Bosnian war, has died in Serbia’s capital Belgrade, according to Bosnian Serb public media. She was 96.

Ms. Plavsic was one of the key Bosnian Serb high officials who implemented a peace agreement signed in Dayton, Ohio, while she was serving as a president of the Bosnian Serb political entity, Republika Srpska, just after the war ended.

During the war she served on the Bosnian Serb leadership council. Considered by Western officials as much more liberal than other Bosnian Serb leaders, she became a vocal opponent of wartime Bosnian Serb President Radovan Karadzic.

Nonetheless, she was indicted in 2000 by The Hague-based UN tribunal for the former Yugoslavia on charges of genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity for her alleged role in the wartime campaign to carve out a separate Serb entity in Bosnia.

She voluntarily surrendered to face justice in 2001, and later pleaded guilty to the crime against humanity of persecution during the war. Other charges were withdrawn.

“Mrs. Plavsic disregarded reports of widespread ethnic cleansing and publicly rationalized and justified it,” the UN court said after she was sentenced. “She was aware that the key leaders of the Serbian Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina ignored these crimes despite the power to prevent and punish them.”

She was sentenced to 11 years imprisonment and was released in 2009 after serving two-thirds of her sentence.

The UN court said that Ms. Plavsic’s guilty plea and her acknowledgement of responsibility

Ms. Plavsic was considered more liberal than other Bosnian Serb leaders.

Former US secretary of state Madeleine Albright told a sentencing hearing that Ms. Plavsic actively supported the Dayton peace agreement. She “stood up for that at times when it was very difficult, when there were those who wanted to destroy the Dayton Accords,” Albright said, according to a court statement.

Republika Srpska’s public broadcaster RTRS reported on Thursday that the Bosnian Serb leader Milorad Dodik had expressed his condolences at the news of Ms. Plavsic’s death, saying that she was his close associate and deserved full state honors.

“Unfortunately, she was unjustly held accountable before the Hague tribunal,” said Dodik, whom a Bosnian court barred from public office last year for his efforts to separate Republika Srpska from Bosnia. “But that was part of a trend in which anyone who held a position in Republika Srpska was held accountable, even if they had personally committed no crime.”

Ms. Plavsic’s death comes just weeks after former Bosnian Serb military chief Ratko Mladic died in detention after being convicted of genocide and other crimes during the Bosnian war.

Morris Ballen, businessman who helped spread indie artists’ music, at 88

By Clay Risen
NEW YORK TIMES

Morris Ballen, whose company, Disc Makers, manufactured small runs of high-quality vinyl records, cassettes, and CDs, offering a critical service to countless punk rockers, rappers, church choirs, and garage bands who made music without the backing of a major label, died Sept. 21 at his home in Philadelphia. He was 88.

His daughter Anne Ballen Ladenson confirmed the death.

Especially in the days before digital music, independent artists faced a challenge: They needed to get physical copies of their music into the hands of their fans, but they couldn’t afford — and didn’t need — the massive production runs offered by major manufacturers.

Enter Mr. Ballen and Disc Makers. His one-stop shop, in a factory outside Philadelphia, provided everything a musician required, including mastering, graphic design and vinyl (and later cassette and CD) pressing, sometimes just a few hundred units at a time.

He also offered free bar codes, so artists could sell their music in record stores, as well as marketing assistance like posters and flyers.

“Disc Makers gave musicians agency to create something on their own, independently,” said Mick Chorba, singer-songwriter for New Jersey-based indie rock band Successful Failures, who has been using Disc Makers for decades.

The company and its predecessor, Ballen Record Co., has been around since the 1940s. But it came into its own in the 1980s, as the declining cost of production equipment and the DIY aesthetic of underground music made Disc Makers a favorite for punk and hip-hop artists.

Henry Rollins, who fronted the punk band Black Flag, was a devoted customer; so were DJ Jazzy Jeff and the Fresh Prince

Eminem even name checked the company in his 2002 song “Nail in the Coffin.”

But Mr. Ballen, who ran the company with his brother, Larry, worked with anyone and everyone.

“There is no such thing as a typical customer,” he told The Los Angeles Times in 1996. “You have demos for new bands. You have churches. You have marching bands.”

Mr. Ballen liked to hire musicians; at times, they comprised more than three-quarters of the employee rolls.

“I think he thought their brains were wired differently because they could learn music, they could communicate with people, they could work in teams,” said Jim Foley, whose band Canadian Invasion was a client and who later worked there himself, “and they generally were hustlers.” Foley is now president of BookBaby, a division of Disc Makers’ parent company, DIY Media Group, focused on independent publishing. There were so many musicians working at the company, in fact, that for more than 20 years Disc Makers hosted DM Palooza, a charity music festival featuring their bands.

Over more than 30 years, Mr. Ballen and his brother took the company from under $5 million in revenue to more than $40 million, all while navigating the rapid shifts from vinyl to cassette to CD.

With the rise of digital formats, Disc Makers had to pivot again, adding a distribution arm to get clients’ music onto online platforms. It also added an e-book division.

“Our vinyl revenues at Disc

Mr. Ballen, above at his CD-making facility in 1998, navigated rapid shifts in music format.

Makers are up 400 percent over the last three years,” Tony van Veen, the chief executive, said in an interview. “This business is growing again.”

Morris Louis Ballen was born on Aug. 10, 1938, in Philadelphia. His father, Ivin, was founder and owner of the Ballen Record Co. It was very much a family business: His mother, Rose (Ostroff) Ballen, worked in the office, and he and his brother worked there in high school.

By the time he graduated from the Wharton School of the University of Pennsylvania in 1960, with a degree in economics and accounting, he knew he wanted to work for his father.

The Ballen Record Co. began as a label, with its own vinyl press. Especially after it bought Gotham Records, a New York label, from Sam Goody, the music retailer, it was known for its stable of blues, gospel, and R&B acts.

The label business was unpredictable in the rapidly changing music landscape of the 1950s, so Ivin Ballen shifted to manufacturing for other labels — first 78s, then 45 rpm singles, and later to LPs and eight-track cassettes. He changed the company’s name to Disc Makers in 1959.

Even that side of the industry could be tough: Among its clients was Cameo-Parkway, which hit it big with Chubby Checker’s “The Twist,” in 1960.

It was “probably the biggest single record we ever manufactured,” Morris Ballen told The Jewish Exponent in 1995. “But when that label collapsed, we collapsed for a while.”

After another downturn in 1980 that briefly pushed the company into Chapter 11 bank-

Every woman remembers the smell: sweat commingling with warm rum. And the sticky floors. The thump-thump-thump of music. Those chunky Steve Madden platform shoes. The sense of possibility tempered with caution until one more beer, maybe, and caution slips away. Just another Saturday night.

I was in college in the late 1990s. I went to Mount Holyoke, an all-women's school where we usually took a shuttle, the PVTA, to neighboring campuses for co-ed parties. One such party was TAP at Amherst College. We'd tumble off the bus, file into See-lye Hall, and drink cheap beer from red plastic cups until the last bus to South Hadley pulled out of Boltwood Avenue. Some of us didn't go home until the next day.

There was a degrading pageantry aspect to the enterprise. But any degradation was overridden by the promise of — what exactly? Maybe fun.

I never left Amherst with anything worse than a hangover, but the following year, I met my boyfriend at UMass. I was alone in his darkened dorm room while he talked to someone down the hall. I began to drift to sleep when a bunch of men staggered in. I recognized the voices of his roommate's friends. They seemed drunk and angry. Their night hadn't gone as planned. I lay there, hoping they wouldn't notice me. They all sat down on their secondhand couch and cracked open beers.

"Dude," one said. "What if we just take turns on this girl?"

"I don't know," another one said. "That's Brian's girlfriend..."

How often do women long to make themselves invisible? I folded myself against the cinderblock wall as they debated whether or not to assault me. As if it were their choice. Their right. As if my very presence were an offering. There were no cellphones. No one to text. So I made a choice.

I am perhaps the most uncoordinated person on the planet, but I leapt off that bunk bed in a single bound, landed on my feet, burst out the door, and charged down the hallway until I located my boyfriend. I was furious. Disgusted. And shaken — so shaken.

Brian moved out of this room and filed for a dorm change the very next day. He is now my husband.

My experience was minor compared with what the victim at Cornell University endured in 2024 at the hands of seven men who allegedly gang raped her at a Chi Phi frat house, along with more on a group chat who apparently just scrolled on past when they knew what was happening.

It's been decades since I've gone to a frat party in Steve Madden platform shoes, and I have never, thank God, been raped. Now, though, I'm raising two sons — and the Cornell story brought me right back to those parties, worried about my two sons who were born sweet, cuddly, and innocent but could grow into predatory louts who assume women are theirs for the taking.

I wondered if the accused rapists were born sweet, too, and how they turned cold. Did they hug their mothers after a long day at nursery school? Did they grin toothlessly for their first grade picture? When did they turn bad? Were they, at one time, good?

When I talked to my teenager about Cornell, he bristled.

"Mom, you know I'm a good person!" he insisted, as though the talk were perfunctory. He's a good person: check!

And I do know he's a good person. I think most parents want to believe that their children are good: Who sets out to raise an asshole? But good is just the baseline. The conversation does not, cannot, end there.

What I really wanted to know was: Would you speak up in a text thread? Would you be the one to tell your friends to knock it off? Would you have the courage to dial 911?

"Being a man isn't just about being good," I told him. "It's about being courageous."

And I thought about that word: courage. It should not take courage to do the right thing in this world. But yet, it does. I see his text messages. I know how kids talk. There's nothing nefarious there, not really. But if every other kid is talking smack, it's pretty hard to be the lone friend to say, "Hey guys! I think this is inappropriate." When you're 16 and just want to fit in, self-preservation overrides moral certainty real fast.

But morality should not be a solo enterprise. The larger problem is that courage is not mainstream. It isn't valued or prized. Our priorities are out of whack. I mean "our" in the larger cultural sense, with the messages that are fed to us about what's important, especially when we think about elite colleges.

Eighty-nine percent of victims of reported rape are girls and women. 1 in 3 undergrad women experience rape or sexual assault during four-plus years in college, according to the Rape, Abuse & Incest National Network (RAINN).

Right now, there are interior decorators who style college dorm rooms. Rush consultants who specialize in matching kids with Greek organizations. There are Instagram slideshows of kids getting recruited for competitive sports snapped by professional photographers; get-ready-with-me TikToks showing girls how to prepare for the next party; heated debates in my town and elsewhere over how to bypass preliminary math so that kids can take calculus a year early for an extra edge.

Every week, I field glossy brochures from SAT prep courses, promising my child an advantage. There are consultants who help high school students curate their personal brands, service hours, and digital footprints before they've even applied to college.

This misses the point. As parents of teenagers, the only personal brand we should be interested in is integrity. What would it look like if society actually rewarded and rehearsed decency the way it rewards achievement? But, sadly, decency is not an industry.

We need tutorials for boys about how to stand up for women and how to speak up. We don't need one more SAT prep course or branding session. We need to place that kind of emphasis, that kind of social capital, on teaching boys how to be good men.

Crafting a perfect story to land at an elite college means absolutely nothing if you're morally bankrupt at worst or complicit at best once you arrive. It means absolutely nothing for the girl who goes back to her perfectly decorated dorm room having been assaulted.

We're focusing on the wrong things.

Where are the high school classes that teach not only health ed and consent, but also humanity? When scrolling electives for my sophomore, I saw plenty of fantastic courses in art and team sports. I'd love to see a mandatory seminar about masculinity and bystander intervention training, with real scenarios: group chats, leaked photos, hazing.

I wish coaches were required to teach leadership skills that punctured toxic groupthink. I wish there were awards for kids who intervened, challenged cruelty, or reported a dangerous situation, celebrated with the same enthusiasm as National Merit Scholars or a championship game. I wish there were more role models for boys and men; ones who could make courage aspirational instead of a fluke.

Most of all, I wish we could broaden what boys and men receive status and accolades for: restraint, empathy, outspokenness, the willingness to risk social capital by doing the right thing. I mean, my husband got a wife out of it. (Sometimes he might wonder if this was a reward. I would like to think so.)

But the culture around success right now — around manhood, and womanhood too — often capitalizes on selling achievement, presentation, and crafting a brand to get into college. Moral courage isn't easily monetized. It isn't particularly glamorous. It doesn't exist in the marquee moments or easy arcs: the big win, the state title, the huge scholarship. It's the ordinary, day-in-and-day-out pattern of living a decent life.

Kids are sold ways to get ahead. We also need to teach them how to stand up, not because there are rewards or accolades, but because it's part of the human contract. That's something you cannot find in a prep course or a TikTok tutorial. The real measure of a good kid isn't GPA or community service hours. It's what they're willing to lose to do the right thing.

But until courage carries the same social currency as achievement, I worry that silence will remain the easier choice.

Godzilla invades this year's New York Film Festival

By Odie Henderson

GLOBE STAFF

Festival season continues with the New York Film Festival, which offers 18 days of cinema selections for the press and public alike. This year's lineup repeats some films from other fests, like Toronto and Cannes, while offering some anticipated world premieres and revivals. The famous fountain in the middle of Lincoln Center will bear witness to the annual crowd of movie lovers heading toward the venues showing works by Tom McCarthy, Ava DuVernay, and James Gray.

And for the first time, a certain giant of Japanese cinema emerged at Alice Tully Hall, disproving the notion that the NYFF shows nothing but movies for indie snobs. I've attended this festival since 1991, and would never have imagined it would show a Godzilla movie.

Let's start my first of two dispatches with that big ol' kaiju. While that nor'easter from last week drenched the I-95 corridor, attendees at Alice Tully Hall braved the elements to witness the world premiere of "Godzilla Minus Zero," the sequel to the Oscar-winning 2024 film "Godzilla Minus One." Writer-director Takashi Yamazaki, and his stars Minami Hamabe and Ryûnosuke Kamiki, return with a new chapter of the Shikishima family's life in post-World War II Japan. The film is set primarily in 1949.

I was at a screening with my fellow critics, but from what I heard, the public screening brought the house down the way Godzilla smashes a building. A lot of houses come down in this sequel, most of them courtesy of an event I'm not allowed to mention. The score by Naoki Satô is ominous and foreboding. Godzilla's immortal theme gets a beefy makeover that sounds like every trombone and viola in Japan was used to record it.

As with most sequels, this one's bigger, louder, darker, and longer; the spectacle is worth it, however, and Yamazaki may earn his second best visual effects Oscar after his win for "Godzilla Minus One."

The NYFF screened "Godzilla Minus Zero" for the press the morning before its world premiere. Watching a kaiju movie on a rainy Saturday morning in the New York City area took me back to my childhood. Except now I was sitting in the Walter Reade Theater instead of in front of a television — and I was watching an R-rated movie. For the first time in 37 films, Godzilla is in a movie kids can't see without an adult.

You'll have to wait until November to experience an adventure that's equally terrifying and heartbreaking, not to mention a lot of fun. Yamazaki lingers on the carnage long enough to make the MPA skittish, but I'm not sure if this deserved an R (its predecessor was PG-13). The MCU movies are just as violent, but they skirt the R by being relatively bloodless. People bleed in "Godzilla Minus Zero."

Another hot ticket at this year's NYFF was the restoration of Ken Russell's 1971 horror movie, "The Devils." This film was so controversial in its imagery that its distributor, Warner Bros, demanded cuts to a movie that had already been rated X by the ratings board. At the time, it was believed that the excised footage had been destroyed.

For decades, this censored material was as big a white whale to cineastes as the missing footage from Orson Welles's "The Magnificent Ambersons." Unlike Welles's film, "The Devils" has finally been restored to the vision its director intended, and is being released by Clockwork, the new revival arm of Warners. Also unlike "The Magnificent Ambersons," "The Devils" isn't a good movie. It's an over-the-top bore based on a possession that occurred in Loudon, France in 1634. I bet it happened just like this movie depicts it, with camera zooms and nuns executing stripper maneuvers while under the spell of Old Scratch.

This was my third time seeing the film (and my first time in its completed version). I didn't like it the first two times, and I knew that a few minutes of supposedly scandalous debauchery involving nuns wasn't going to suddenly make me give this movie four stars. However, the new footage is admittedly the Ken Russell-est of all Ken Russell scenes, which means all shock value is negated by its unintentional hilarity. Ken Russell's gonna Ken Russell, and you can't help but applaud him for that.

I know I'm supposed to rant and rave about this new version, rending my garments with exaltation the way Vanessa Redgrave's sex-mad nun does after licking the blood off Oliver Reed's interpretation of Jesus. That's not going to happen. I'm happy the movie can finally be seen the way the director intended — censorship should never be tolerated. But that doesn't mean I have to like "The Devils." Decide for yourself when it gets a one-week release on Oct. 16.

An scene from "Godzilla Minus Zero."

When I discovered that James Gray's "Paper Tiger" was originally intended as a sequel to his dreadful 2022 film "Armageddon Time," I wanted no part of it. However, I'm duty-bound to cover the opening night film of the New York Film Festival. To my surprise, this Adam Driver-led vehicle had nothing to do with the prior film. Instead, Gray returns to the neo-noirish gangster trapings that propelled earlier works like "We Own the Night" and "Little Odessa."

Set in 1980s New York City, "Paper Tiger" follows the Pearl family, led by nebbish patriarch Irwin (Miles Teller) and his wife, Linda (Scarlett Johansson). Their lives are upended by the return of former cop and black sheep of the family, Irwin's older brother, Gary (Driver). After leaving the precinct, Gary became financially successful and estranged from Irwin. His return proves you should never trust anyone who comes to your house with gifts of Peter Luger steaks (and Peter Luger employees to serve them).

Gary wants scientist Irwin to go in on a project to advise a Russian company about cleaning up the Gowanus Canal. A seemingly innocent job turns dangerous when Irwin sees something he should not have seen, putting his family and his own life in jeopardy. Meanwhile, Linda is facing her own crisis at home, and I don't mean ScarJo's overbaked Noo Yawk City accent.

Gray ratchets up the tension in every scene, delivering an effective, if flawed, thriller with enough New York-based Easter eggs to satisfy its residents. Johansson is good, and Driver is a riveting study in contrasts. But it's Teller who's the biggest surprise. An actor whose work I have never been a fan of, Teller delivers the best performance in "Paper Tiger."

Netflix's war drama shines a light on gay love and talent

Exploring the beauty of love amid the horrors of war, "La Bola Negra" has captivated audiences from Cannes to Toronto ahead of the Spanish-language drama's Boston debut.

Netflix's generations-spanning epic from directors Javier Calvo and Javier Ambrossi (known together as Los Javis) is the closing night movie for this year's CineFest Latino Boston, screening Sunday at the Coolidge (the film returns to the Brookline theater beginning Oct. 30 and expands to additional Boston-area theaters Nov. 6). Set across 1932, 1937, and 2017, "La Bola Negra" tells an intricately woven story about three gay men navigating the challenges of their times, connected by a history of love, loss, and family secrets.

As the bulk of the film takes place just prior to and during the Spanish Civil War, Ambrossi admitted he was "very surprised" to see a story so heavily steeped in Spanish history resonate with viewers around the world. "La Bola Negra," which serves as Spain's best international feature selection for the upcoming Oscars, won the People's Choice Award at the Toronto International Film Festival last month, with Los Javis also winning the best director prize at this year's Cannes Film Festival.

"We just wanted to write and direct and produce a movie about Spanish culture and Spanish history," Ambrossi told the Globe. "But people [are] connecting a lot with the universal love of the movie and the universal message that we have to live."

At Cisco Brewers Seaport, a meeting spot for post-work drinks and mingling, a recent Thursday night started like a middle school formal, with young men clustered in groups on one side and young women on the other. Finally, as drinks started flowing, the ice melted, and they began to mix.

Boston dating platforms, Stoop Dating and STAG Boston, had teamed up, booked space at the venue, and invited singles to take part in what was essentially a mass blind date. Stoop Dating and STAG have staged similar events across the city, betting that Gen Z singles are fed up with dating apps and hungry to meet potential mates face to face.

It appears they are right. Across the Alan Cumming excels in 'Tip Toe,' a drama about a new age of homophobia

By Chris Vognar

"Tip Toe," the lively but deeply sad new British series making its US premiere this Friday on Starz, would be getting a huge amount of buzz were it set in the States. It's a resonant cry of rage against increasingly vitriolic attacks on gay and trans people, particularly as amplified by the internet hate machine. But it's also a finely acted, carefully layered human drama about how we fear what we don't understand, and why we so often blame others for the graves we dig ourselves. The fact that it presages its final, shocking act of violence at the very beginning of the series points to a haunting fatalism that echoes long after the final credits have rolled.

So how can it also be so fun to watch? Reason No. 1 is Alan Cumming. Best known these days as the man behind the hit reality competition series "The Traitors," the long-time stage and screen star does ev-

1 SMASHING PUMPKINS The Grammy-winning alt rock legends are back in Boston as a part of “The Rats in a Cage Tour,” which headlines TD Garden this Friday. Frontman Billy Corgan revealed in the tour announcement that the first set of this weekend’s show will be dedicated to album “Melon Collie and the Infinite Sadness,” which just celebrated its 30th anniversary, before diving into the rest of the band’s multi-decade catalog. Oct. 2, 8 p.m. Tickets start at $119. 100 Legends Way. tdgarden.com/events/detail/the-smashing-pumpkins — Daisy Levine

2 HARPOON OCTOBERFEST Harpoon Brewery, which celebrates its 40th anniversary this year, has two days of Octoberfest festivities planned for this weekend. Friday features glow-in-the-dark fun with live music, beer and cocktails, plus a selection of food from Roxy’s Grilled Cheese, the Harpoon kitchen, and more. Visitors can also partake in activities like glow-in-the-dark stein hoisting, coozie decorating, and cornhole. Saturday’s event will include more traditional, Munich-inspired activities. Oct. 2-3, 6-11 p.m. on Friday, noon-7 p.m. on Saturday. Tickets start at $15. Harpoon Brewery and Beer Hall, 306 Northern Ave. harpoonbrewery.com/event/harpoon-octoberfest-2026 — Janira Skrbkova

3 TOPSFIELD FAIR The annual county fair returns this fall for 11 days of family-friendly entertainment. Presented by the Essex Agricultural Society, the weekend festivities include a giant pumpkin weigh-off, a sheep obstacle course, a hot dog-eating contest, a canine aquatics show, plus a fireworks display on Saturday. Visitors can also enjoy live music and concessions. Oct. 2-12. Tickets are $20 at the gate or $23 online. 207 Boston St., Topsfield. topsfieldfair.org — JS

4 BOSTON FESTIVAL OF INDIE GAMES BostonFIG is back — a day of family-friendly entertainment from some of the gaming world’s rising stars. Play a variety of unique games, partake in discussions, see the awards and showcase, and introduce yourself to the indie gaming community. Oct. 3, 10-5 p.m. $35. Kids under 12 are free. The Cyclorama at Boston Center for the Arts, 539 Tremont St. bostonfig.com — DL

5 SPICETOBER FEST Boston’s hottest fall celebration will celebrate bold local flavors and talent this weekend. Visitors can test their limits at a hot sauce tasting challenge, enjoy spice-forward concessions, watch stage demonstrations from Boston chefs, enjoy live music, and more. Oct. 3, 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. Free. Boston City Hall Plaza, Northern Terrace, 1 City Hall Square. spicetoberfest.com — JS

6 AMMA MARFO ‘FIDGET. SPINSTER.’ TAPING A rising voice in the Boston comedy scene and self-described “anxious Black nerd,” Marfo has been workshoping this one-woman multimedia show about dating and commitment for nearly a year and a half, and she is ready to commit it to video at Porter Square Books Boston location. Oct. 3, 7 p.m. $27.38. Porter Square Books: Boston Edition, 50 Liberty Drive. simpletix.com/e/new-normal-comedy-presents-amma-marfo-s-fi-tickets-290142 — Nick A. Zaino III

7 KATHY GRIFFIN: NEW FACE, NEW TOUR Even though she is now friends with people like Paris Hilton and the Kardashians, whom she lampooned on her “My Life On the D-List,” Griffin has not relented in taking on pop culture and politics onstage, targeting everyone from Trump to Taylor Swift, and most of all, herself (“New Face, New Tour” is a reference to her latest cosmetic surgery). Oct. 3, 7 p.m. $70-$94. The Wilbur, 246 Tremont St. thewilbur.com — NZ

8 LAURA SEVERSE A Boston native now living in Los Angeles, Severse remembers a painful moment around the family dinner table when her two kids thought their parents were getting a divorce and immediately said they were going with their dad. “That hurt a little bit,” she says, “because the audacity of these kids to [expletive] ever think that I would file for custody?” Oct. 3, 9 p.m. $39.90. Laugh Boston, 425 Summer St. 617-725-2844, laughboston.com — NZ

9 FIESTA EN LA PLAZA Back for its fourth year, Fiesta En La Plaza returns with a special presentation of “One Night in Alosha,” an afternoon-long celebration of the Afro-Latin diaspora right in City Hall Plaza. This free, all-ages event features contemporary performance from Latin America and the Caribbean, including music, dance, and a live podcast taping. Oct. 4, 1:30 p.m. City Hall Plaza, 1 City Hall Square. pietix.com/fiesta-en-la-plaza-alosha — DL

COVENANT

In this gripping production of York Walker’s eerie Southern gothic drama, one of the questions implicitly asked and chillingly answered is: How far would you go to get what — or whom — you want? Directed by Dawn M. Simmons with a sure grasp of atmosphere and pace, “Covenant” tells the story of a bluesman (Anthony T. Goss) who prompts rumors he sold his soul to the devil when he returns to his Georgia hometown in the mid-1930s, possessing musical gifts he didn’t have before and intent on marrying the young woman (Deannah DRIPP Blemur) he’s been smitten with for more than a decade. *Through Oct. 17. ALL MY SONS

A powder keg of a production whose fuse is lit early on and slowly burns while we watch and wait. In Arthur Miller’s 1947 drama, the Keller family faces a harsh reckoning several years after the factory run by father Joe (a superb Bill Mootos) shipped defective airplane parts that resulted in the deaths of 21 pilots during World War II. Directed by Scott Edmiston, “All My Sons” serves as a reminder that Miller had created a work of profoundly enduring resonance even before writing “Death of a Salesman.” Extended through Oct. 25. Lyric Stage

BENJAMIN ROSE

BOUNCERS

John Godber’s raucous comedy is about a single night in a Yorkshire disco, as seen through the eyes of a quartet of bouncers — played by Joe Siriani, Liam McCarron, Michael Ferrari, and Bradley Belanger — as they try to cope with the club’s rowdy, drunken clientele. Directed by Bill Doncaster. *Through Oct. 24. Production by Visual City LLC and the Modern Theatre at Suffolk University. PARADE

Ken Crossman plays Leo Frank,

a Jewish factory manager wrongly convicted of the murder of 13-year-old Mary Phagan and lynched by a Georgia mob in 1915, in the Tony-winning musical by Jason Robert Brown (music and lyrics) and Alfred Uhry (book). Eliza Barmakian plays Lucille Frank, Leo’s wife. The cast also includes Thain Bertin, Darren Paul, Barbara Pierre, Amanda Sargent, Tim Lawton, Matthew Zahnzinger, James Allen, Nick Corsi, Abby Jarcho, and Ellie Lauter. Directed by Brit Garner, with music direction by Alex Taylor. Through Oct. 10. Newton Theatre Company, Newton. eventbrite.com

H+H steps into fall with Handel’s Milton-inspired oratorio “L’Allegro, il penseroso ed il moderato,” a meditation on the human spirit featuring artistic director Jonathan Cohen, vocal soloists Joëlle Harvey, Paul Appleby, and Michael Sumuel, and Massachusetts poet laureate Regie Gibson alongside the H+H Orchestra and Chorus. A reception welcoming new president Lecolion Washington Jr. will follow both concerts. Oct. 2, 7:30 p.m., Oct. 4, 3 p.m. Symphony Hall, 301 Massachusetts Ave. 617-262-1815, handelandhaydn.org

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

At this weekend’s all-Rachmaninoff program, pianist and BSO frequent flyer Seong-Jin Cho joins the orchestra and music director Andris Nelsons for “Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini” before the orchestra closes things out with the Symphony No. 2. Next week, Nelsons leads the United States premiere of Francisco Coll’s new piano concerto featuring pianist Kirill Gerstein; Beethoven’s “Coriolan” Overture and Symphony No. 7 round out that program. *Oct. 8-10. HOCKNEY REPRODUCTION(S)

The British painter David Hockney, who died earlier this year at 88, was a titan of painting’s resurgence in the 1960s and ’70s after years of bone-dry conceptualism. But was Hockney, a devoutly exuberant colorist, a closet conceptualist himself? This little show, organized by the artist’s Gloucester-based friend Bing McGilvray, explores the artist’s keen interest in serial production of his work by various means — including, in one case, a fax machine. Hockney’s canonical painting oeuvre ran parallel to a tireless drive to break new ground wherever the game experimentalist could find it, as this show explores. *Through Oct. 18. COUNTER HISTORY: CONTEMPORARY ART FROM THE COLLECTION

“How do we remember the past, and how does it inform the present?” is the central query posed by this exhibition of several dozen works acquired by the MFA in recent years, and it’s hard to imagine a more fraught or timely frame for the current moment. In a regressive time in American culture, the show feels like a flashing beacon in the gathering dark, with artists including Andy Warhol, Mark Bradford, Jeffrey Gibson, Dana Chandler Jr., and Steve Locke here to “stand against official narratives” to “set the record straight.” Hold that thought tight. We’re going to need it. Ongoing. Museum of Fine Arts Boston, 465 Huntington Ave. 617-267-9300, mfa.org

WHY LOOK AT HORSES?

An exhibition with disturbingly on-point accidental timing — wild horses in the west have been recently victimized by a rapacious federal government determined to make meat of them — this exhibition asks an essential question about mankind’s most noble animal symbol of progress: “What happens when an animal that once shaped the course of human history becomes experienced primarily as an image?” A wild guess, if you’ll pardon the pun: We become disconnected from its physicality, its animal-ness, and distracted by its symbolic might. Recent events should be enough to shake off the distraction, but we’ll see. Through March 14. Colby College Museum of Art, 5600 Mayflower Hill Drive, Waterville, Maine. 207-859-5600, museum.colby.edu

Kelly Feirtag doesn't remember many details about the first she show she ever attended, but she remembers how it made her feel.

SOUND CHECK

"My best friend's mom bought us tickets and brought us, and I had no idea what it was, and I don't think my friend did, either," Feirtag says on a recent phone call. "I just remember being like, 'Oh my God, there's so many women'. . . I was so young, but it felt like such a safe place."

The event was Lilith Fair, Sarah McLachlan's traveling music festival that exclusively featured women performers and women-led acts. Over the course of Lilith Fair's existence — three editions in the 1990s, and another in 2010 — the festival raised millions of dollars for charity with stacked lineups that included artists like Missy Elliot, Erykah Badu, Indigo Girls, Bonnie Raitt, Queen Latifah, the Pretenders, and Fiona Apple.

It's no wonder that 20 years later Feirtag would become one of the co-founders of Ladyfest Martha's Vineyard, an annual all-ages festival in Oak Bluffs that fosters a similar environment. Launched in 2017, the one-day event takes place every fall to raise money for CONNECT to End Violence, an island-based domestic violence program and rape crisis center that offers free short-term counseling, court advocacy, and other services. This year's festival, which takes place Saturday, marks Ladyfest's ninth year on Martha's Vineyard and second year at Waban Park.

Ladyfest isn't limited to women artists, but the lineups typically skew in that direction. (The name "Ladyfest" comes from a 2000 event launched in Washington state, which has inspired spinoffs across the globe, including in Madrid, Budapest, and Shanghai.) Two Los Angeles acts are making the trek for Saturday's event — Wolftrap and Sunny War — but the majority of the performers are New Englanders. Hartford, Conn., artist GABI sings bossa-nova-inspired pop; Ali McGuirk, who was raised outside of Boston, remains a staple of New England's blues scene in her new home of Montpelier, Vt.; and Kate Taylor, sister of James and Livingston, needs little introduction.

Did you miss Olivia Rodrigo's all-women music fest? Head to this Martha's Vineyard event instead.

Delanie Pickering, an internationally-traveling blues artist, calls Martha's Vineyard home, as do the Alpha Gals, Elda Berlin, DJ Dolce Vita, and dance group Island Hip-Hop.

Events in the vein of Lilith Fair and Ladyfest are common, but not easy to sustain. Similar Boston-area shows from the recent past include Reimagining Lilith Fair, held at Club Passim, and the free, outdoors We Make Noise Fest, neither of which have returned this year. Even McLachlan's Lilith Fair only lasted for four years, including its 2010 revival. But the Martha's Vineyard edition of Ladyfest has been growing steadily since its first edition at the Ritz Cafe, the Oak Bluffs bar and venue that Feirtag managed at the time. When attendees started spilling out of the 99-person dive, Feirtag shifted the festivities to

Last year, the event made the leap to Waban Park — "the perfect location for something like this," Feirtag says — and featured headliner esperanza spalding, the nationally renowned Berklee alumna and jazz bass wiz.

"I think [the longevity] has a lot to do with personal relationships," says Feirtag, "and the people that are on Martha's Vineyard want to be a part of this."

In August, 23-year-old pop star Olivia Rodrigo reignited conversations about Lilith Fair-style events when she launched her own women-led music festival, Daisy Chain Fields. The Irvine, Calif. event sold out in 30 minutes, drew 45,000 attendees, and raised over $20 million for nonprofits that support women and girls. (Not to mention that the bill was stellar, with Bikini Kill, Doechii, Chappell Roan, McLachlan, and Rodrigo among the performers.)

Speaking as someone whose introduction to live music was Lilith Fair, Feirtag says that Rodrigo's effort "gives me a lot of hope in the world, and for the next generation."

GIG GUIDE

After weathering two storms — "Macklegate" and last weekend's nor'easter — Gillette Stadium closes its concert season with a twofer from country singer Zach Bryan, who promotes his January album, "With Heaven On Top," Friday and Saturday.

Just in time for pumpkin spice fever, fans of the Smashing Pumpkins will get a double shot of the alt-rock band Friday at TD Garden, as they perform "distinct," back-to-back sets honoring the belated 30th anniversary of their LP "Mellon Colie and the Infinite Sadness." Pop artist beabadoobee, who just released the gritty LP "Pylon," makes her headlining debut at the arena Saturday, followed by Tuesday and Wednesday appearances from indie rock darling Phoebe Bridgers, who this fall juggles the release of her third studio album, "Lost Weekend," and her acting debut in the new Robert Pattinson-led thriller, "Primer."

MGM Music Hall at Fenway breaks into new territory with a "toddler techno" show Sunday, courtesy of family-friendly DJ Lenny Pearce. Otherwise it's business as usual at the venue, as Foster the People share danceable yet vulnerable indie-pop Tuesday, Christian rock group Skillet toast the 20th anniversary of their album "Comatose" Wednesday, and South Korean pop group Monsta X perform their first-ever headlining show in Massachusetts Thursday.

Across the street, the House of Blues welcomes a joint tour from Brazilian stars Eduardo Costa and Pablo Friday and the twisting rhythms of Cape Verdean artist Djodje Saturday. The Agganis Arena's schedule this weekend is just as diverse, with Pakistani singer Rahat Fateh Ali Khan visiting Friday and Greek performer Konstantinos Argiros stopping by Saturday.

John Lydon wasn't at Royale with the Sex Pistols earlier this week; instead he's at Big Night Live Saturday with the other band he co-founded, Public Image Ltd. If you want to double down on post-punk, Interpol head to Roadrunner Sunday. (Also at Roadrunner this week: indie-pop dreamers MUNA on Friday, folk group Buffalo Traffic Jam on Monday, and eccentric alt-rock vets Modest Mouse on Wednesday.)

The Linda Lindas are all grown up at the Paradise Rock Club Tuesday; the all-women rock band went viral as kids in 2021, and have since released three albums, including August's "GOTTA GET OUT"

NOW SPINNING

Pink Slip, "Bathtub Madonna." Would you rather have fun, or rage against the gradual decline of, well, everything? With "Bathtub Madonna," Boston's Pink Slip boldly ask — why should you have to choose? The seven-piece ska-punk band jump, jive, and bounce through life's frustrations on their debut album, nine songs' worth of proof that everything is less infuriating if you add the right amount of horns. Pink Slip celebrate the new LP with a Friday show at Faces in Malden.

BONUS TRACK

Saturday at Club Passim, Kim Moberg hosts an early celebration of Indigenous People Day with a performance of her project "The Seven Fires Prophecy Suite for Humanity." Moberg, a Cape Cod-based artist of Tlingit descent, will be joined by Americana opener Thea Hopkins, a member of the Aquinnah Wampanoag tribe of Martha's Vineyard.

beabadoobee performs at TD Garden Oct. 3.

By Maura Johnston
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

"I want moshing!"

That's the vision Beatrice Laus, the Filipino-English singer-songwriter known as beabadoobee, has for her current tour, which stops at TD Garden Saturday. With her fourth album "Pylon," which came out in September, beabadoobee has laid the groundwork for such crowd antics: It's an elliptical full-length with gnarled guitars that recall Boston-area indie legends of the '90s, like Blake Babies and Helium, with beabadoobee's candy-coated voice twisting around them.

beabadoobee — the name comes from an old friends-only Instagram account — began as a bedroom-pop artist, with her debut single, the sparse singalong "Coffee," possessing the immediate feel of a 4-track demo.

"I always write music like a journal or my diary, very personal and honest," Laus wrote via email.

Her later singles expanded her sonic palette and revealed

BEABADOOBEE
With Wisp. At TD Garden, 100 Legends Way, Saturday, Oct. 3, 8 p.m. Tickets: $54 and up. tdgarden.com her interest in droll, feedback-drenched indie rock; "She Plays Bass" is an ode to her bass player and pal Eliana Sewell that crashes and shimmers, while "I Wish I Was Stephen Malkmus" name-checks the lead singer of slacker-rock kings Pavement and throws glitter on that band's laconic vibes.

A few years after its original release, the producer-songwriter Powfu sampled "Coffee" on his track "death bed (coffee for your head)," warping beabadoobee's original song just enough to make her voice heighten the song's regretful tone. The track became a hit almost immediately after its release, serving as the soundtrack to a massive number of lockdown-era clips on TikTok, and getting airplay on almost every non-country radio format.

beabadoobee's profile rose in the wake of that left-field smash, but she remained true to her vision, releasing albums that dug in further to her love of swirling dream-pop and smartly angled riffs. Last month she released "Pylon," which digs into those inspirations further alongside a slew of A-list alt-rock guests like Brendan Yates (of the Baltimore warehouse-scene heroes Turnstile) and sharp-tongued singer-songwriter Hayley Williams.

The 26-year-old worked out the new songs in hotel rooms, which brought her back to the early days of making music in her bedroom.

"A lot of this album was written while on the road and in between being on tour," she explained. "So [I was in] a lot of hotel rooms while coming to the understanding and acceptance that this is my life. It really struck me while being on the road in the middle of nowhere — sometimes, places [where] I don't even know where I am — but still finding the things that reminded me of home."

Those moments in "the middle of nowhere" and a growing obsession with pylons — the hulking structures that dot highways around the world — inspired the album's title.

"Often, I'd be on buses looking out the window, seeing pylons and realizing that they are always there — such strong and blunt structures spread out all over, city to city, and the thing that keeps us all connected," she wrote. "Something about that made me feel comforted and assured. I'd take that feeling and write in my hotel rooms."

"Pylons are pretty badass," she added.

Musically, "Pylon" has a lot of similar qualities to its namesakes. beabadoobee hardened her sound just enough to make songs like the speedy, sneering "Sun Has Set" and the chiming "It's Alright" land like world-beaters, while the feedback-drenched "Switchblade" is one of the album's many highlights, its churning verses exploding into a shout-along chorus.

"I also had some sessions with Shane [Moran, from the post-hardcore titans Title Fight] and others in studios where we were starting in a place that felt like we wanted things to be loud and very live."

That intensity even translates to the album's quieter moments, like the icy "Spark" and the spaced-out "Despite That," which have an urgency about them that should turn into live catharsis.

beabadoobee's current tour is her first stint headlining arenas, and she's made sure that her staging will be as structure-filling as her music.

"I'm so excited to play these shows, because I'm bringing in the biggest stage design I've had to date, and it's going to be super fun," she wrote. "Me and my team had the stage design in mind and would talk about it way before the album was even recorded, so it's going to be fun to show the fans the album, performing with all the visuals."

ARTS IN BRIEF

The big picture, very big, at the Coolidge

In “Digger,” Tom Cruise plays a larger-than-life energy mogul. To film the movie, director Alejandro González Iñárritu chose a format worthy of its subject, VistaVision. It’s similar to CinemaScope, the best-known large-screen format. Developed in the ’50s, VistaVision is famed for the quality of the images it produces. It was the format Paul Thomas Anderson used for “One Battle After Another.” The Coolidge Corner Theatre, which showed “Battle” in VistaVision, will be one of only six venues in the world to show “Digger” in the format. “We’re honored to be entrusted yet again with showing one of the season’s highest-profile releases in this rare and technically-challenging format,” Coolidge artistic director Mark Anastasio said in a statement. — Mark Feeney

MFA names new chair for Art of the Americas

The Museum of Fine Arts has named Layla Bermeo as its next John Moors Cabot Chair for the Art of the Americas.

Bermeo, currently a curator of paintings in the Art of the Americas department, takes over from Ethan Lasser, now the MFA’s chief of curatorial affairs and conservation. She begins her new role on Nov. 2.

“Layla’s vision, scholarship, and dedication to community-centered storytelling make her the perfect leader for our Art of the Americas department,” MFA director Pierre Terjanian said in a statement.

Bermeo, who arrived at the MFA as an assistant curator in 2016, organized the museum’s first Frida Kahlo exhibition and has been a driving force behind some important recent acquisitions, including a painting by surrealist Remedios Varo.

As head of the Art of the Americas department, she will oversee a collection of enormous cultural sweep — more than 16,000 objects ranging from Mayan ceramics and pre-Columbian jewelry to paintings by John Singer Sargent and the silverwork of Paul Revere.

“The Art of the Americas department has always been my greatest inspiration for connecting people with art,” Bermeo said in a statement. “I am deeply honored to now be in a position to uplift the curatorial team that has long championed underrepresented artists, experimented with displays and storytelling, and strived to serve audiences from all backgrounds.”

The art of play on display in Ryerson exhibit

Playgrounds don’t just happen; someone has to design them. For several playgrounds in Cambridge, as well as Boston and Watertown, that someone has been artist Mitch Ryerson. “Joyful Anarchy: Mitch Ryerson — Playgrounds,” which celebrates his work, runs at Cambridge Arts’ Gallery 344 through Dec. 31. The exhibition includes models, sketches, and full-size playground pieces, at least one of which visitors are encouraged to play on. A reception will be held at the gallery on Monday, from 5 p.m.-7 p.m. Gallery 344, City Hall Annex, 344 Broadway, Cambridge, www.cambridgema.gov/arts/publicart/gallery344

A Gottlieb donation for Cape Ann Museum

The Cape Ann Museum’s “Avery, Gottlieb & Rothko: By the Sea” has been one of the most popular shows in the museum’s history. It closed Sunday. In August, Mark Rothko’s son, Christopher, announced the donation to CAM of a watercolor by his father. Last week, the Adolph & Esther Gottlieb Foundation announced the gift of a 1936 oil painting to the museum. “It is fitting that this painting will belong to the community where it was conceived,” said Sanford Hirsch, the foundation’s executive director. Later this month, the exhibition opens at the Phillips Collection, in Washington, D.C.

BSO’s free chamber concerts begin this month

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be presenting 11 free hourlong community chamber concerts at different venues around the Boston metropolitan area this year, continuing its neighborhood series that was established in 1998.

The first concert of the autumn will be on Oct. 25 at La CASA, the new Latino arts and culture center in the South End developed by Inquilinos Boricuas in Acción. Violinists Elita Kang and Lucia Lin, violists Rebecca Gitter and Danny Kim, and cellists Jonah Ellsworth and Owen Young will play music by Dvorak, Brahms, and Libby Larsen.

Across the season, the series will feature 23 BSO players and guests, in venues including churches, schools, public libraries, and cultural centers.

Admission is free, but tickets must be reserved in advance. Seats for all concerts will be available at www.bso.org.

WINCHESTER — Four of the five shows currently up at the Griffin Museum of Photography appear under the rubric of “TLC” — meaning tender loving care. The idea is that the photographers display a special degree of concern for or connection to the individuals being photographed.

As organizing principles go that’s more than a little porous. Star Montana photographs her family, so TLC certainly applies. It’s more tenuous with Harlan Bozeman’s photographs of the segregated rural town of Elaine, Ark., Charles H. Lee’s of Black cowboys, and Alanna Airitam’s of members of a Black motorcycle club. The sympathy they share with their subjects is evident. Also, Airitam’s and Lee’s nicely complement each other. They’re both photographing riders, after all. But what good photographer, unless taking mug shots or covering trials at the Hague, doesn’t show at least some sympathy for who she or he is photographing?

“TLC” runs through Oct. 25, as does Lua Kobayashi’s installation “The Persistence of Memories.”

Montana’s “By the rivers, I stood and stared into the sun” includes both family snapshots and her own photographs of her relations. In all of them, there’s a consistent sense of warmth and connectedness. That’s true even of a photograph of Montana’s grandmother’s desk and of the two landscapes in the show.

Montana lives in Los Angeles. Bozeman does not live in Elaine (most recent population estimate 419). Instead, he visited there for four years. So he brings an outsider’s eye but an insider’s sympathy. That’s evident in all 16 of the black-and-white photographs in “Out The E.” That’s true whether they show kids in a playground or a bridge crossing the Mississippi. The images are 20 inches by 25 inches. But none are framed or matted, which helps keep them from seeming imposing.

CHARLES H. LEE

The two dozen photographs from Lee’s series “Sweat + Dirt” are also unframed and unmatted, adding to the matter-of-fact quality they convey. In one sense, there’s nothing new or unusual about Black cowboys. They date back to the Wild West. Which makes Lee’s casualness of approach just right. But within each image, there’s clearly something special going on: the relationship between human and horse, the commitment of each person to a task as hard and demanding as caring for those creatures. A whole lot more is going on here than just saddles and Stetsons and rodeos.

frightens him: internet trolls and right wing culture warriors conflating homosexuality and pedophilia, and men and women — including his best friend, Stephanie (Elizabeth Berrington) — dismissing trans rights.

But Leo’s primary antagonist lives right next door to him, their townhouses separated by just a few feet. Clive Goss (David Morrissey, every bit Cumming’s equal here) is a bundle of blue-collar resentment, a morose, underemployed electrician with two sons: George (Jackson Connor), a closeted 16-year-old, and Saul (Joseph Evans), a 25-year-old hetero beefcake who bares all on OnlyFans. A random mishap brings Leo and Clive together, and even as Leo hires his neighbor to do electrical work at the bar, we know things are going to end very, very badly. to befriend George — he remembers what it was like to be a closeted teen — Clive grows increasingly unstable.

“Tip Toe,” which premiered in the UK earlier this year, occasionally lapses into speechifying; it’s a show with something to say, and it makes sure you get the point. But both of the main characters are carefully written and acted with fierce intelligence. Leo is a little full of himself, and he seems to know it; Clive never feels like a straw man villain, largely because Morrissey won’t let that happen. Rigid and weary, he needs something, somebody, to be a scapegoat, and as he tells Leo, “You lot” must be responsible for everything bad. Morrissey brings to mind Chris Cooper, an actor who excels at bringing repressed and angry figures to life.

But Leo is angry too — angry at the homophobia he’s been fighting his whole life, angry at the abuse his employees and patrons take, and angry at this neighbor who thinks he knows all about him. At times “Tip Toe” plays like a British version of “Beef,” a high-stakes power struggle, except the deck is stacked high against Leo and his “lot.” Even when we have some idea of how it will all end, the climax is shocking, escalating from razzing to accusation to primal mob violence. The series has been building toward this denouement, and as it unfolds, several previous conversations and confrontations

Starz has never really developed a firm identity in this streaming-dominated age, but this is its second high-quality British import of the year, following the premiere of “The Listeners” in June. Like that series, “Tip Toe” unfolds over a brisk five episodes, showing once again that British TV creators, in this case Russell T. Davies, know how to make the most of the less-is-more model of TV storytelling. (See also Apple TV’s “Slow Horses,” which runs through tightly-told six-episode seasons with no letup in quality.) “Tip Toe” comes to us from the UK, but you’d have to bury your head in the sand to miss its relevance on these shores. Kudos to Starz for bringing it to the US, where it deserves to find a robust audience.

An offline dating trend is emerging in the city

country, similar events and services have suddenly taken off. And the owners of Stoop Dating and STAG say their recent events have attracted up to 800 people looking for an in-person connection.

But they need some encouragement.

Stoop Dating and STAG Boston are introducing this new form of blind dating to Boston, creating what they say are easy and open environments for people to meet potential love interests without the stress.

Stoop Dating, created by Julz Radley, and STAG Boston, created by Krissy Bets, are different entities, but they come together to plan these dating events.

Stoop Dating, a social media page started by Radley, works as a pseudo-dating site. Participants sign up for a date, then Radley pairs them up and joins them on a first date to help break the ice. And yes, that date takes place on a stoop — an idea that came to Radley after she moved to South Boston and saw that one way people naturally met was while sitting on a front stoop.

STAG Boston, run by Bets, puts on social events around the city exclusively for singles. Bets started STAG after documenting her own dating experiences in Boston on social media.

After she started to host dating events, Bets saw how much people enjoyed mingling without the added stress of approaching someone at a bar or going on a first date from a dating app.

Now, the two are joining forces and planning the dating events together.

“People are over the dating apps,” Bets said. “On top of that, it’s really hard to approach people at a bar in person and meet people in person because you don’t know if they’re single. You don’t know if they’re interested.”

Unlike a regular date, you can expect yard games, conversation starters, and other activities at a STAG event to keep the energy casual and low-stress.

After the night ends, attendees can fill out a questionnaire indicating who they are interested in getting to know better, so they don’t have to deal with the usual logistics of swiping left or right or getting ghosted on Hinge — or risk rejection.

At these events, Bets said, “You know everybody’s single, and then it takes away the pressure of having to be like, ‘Hey, are you interested? Can I give you my number?’”

It’s no secret that the younger generation is frustrated with the dating scene, but some say dating in Boston is especially difficult.

Fair warning, however: The events are fairly exclusive. Radley and Bets sift through hundreds of applicants; after some are selected, they purchase a ticket, and the hunt for love begins. (Tickets for the STAG Cisco event were $40.)

KEN MCGAGH FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

But that’s not the only way Radley and Bets support their initiatives. As TikTok dating aficionados, they also make their money through brand deals and sponsorships.

“It’s awful,” Emma DeJesus of Somerville said. “I feel like nobody is ready to commit. That’s what I hear the most, ‘You’re great, but I’m not looking for anything serious.’”

“It’s brutal out there,” added Emma Rose, 27, who attended the STAG event at Cisco. “It’s very superficial. You can just swipe and swipe and swipe and these are real people, and you’re just swiping away. ... People don’t approach anyone anymore.”

Many of the attendees came alone, looking for a nice drink and good conversation. While many singles moved around, talking to different potential matches, some hit it off from the start.

Jacob Mulherin, 27, of Marlborough, said he met Courtney Wilson, 32, of Melrose, and immediately hit it off. They stayed attached at the hip the rest of the night.

“I feel like I have a great conversation going right now. That’s a success, right?,” Mulherin said.

The night also included live stoop dates, minus the stoop. After a date, moderated by Ridley, Theo Cooper, 26, of Natick, and Courtney Chapman, 35, of Somerville, stood with their arms around each other.

“I saw her having a quiet moment, and I thought I should share some positive energy,” Cooper said.

“He’s a total babe,” Chapman said about Cooper after the date.

By the end of the night, the bar looked completely different from how it did when the event began. Everyone seemed to be coupled up, flirting and exchanging information.

Here there be spoilers!

It was rather odd that the first trailer released for “Digger” spent most of its runtime as a sizzle reel for Tom Cruise’s career. As clips of the actor’s biggest hits filled a montage, I questioned why we needed this refresher course in the films of one of the most bankable stars of the last four decades. And then it hit me: it was a pure ego trip. After all, this is a man whose Ethan Hunt, in the recent “Mission: Impossible” movies, had other characters offering speeches about his greatness.

My weary cynicism blinded me to the parallel the “Digger” trailer had to Robin Williams’s 1992 disaster, “Toys.” That Barry Levinson film may have the funniest teaser trailer ever cut — and you don’t see a single frame from the movie. It was just Williams riffing. If you’ve seen “Toys,” you know why Fox didn’t want to show you any clips from the movie, opting instead to sucker you in with Williams’s penchant for hilarious improvisation.

When Warner Bros. offered up a second trailer for “Digger,” it was full of clips. Trailers are marketing devices, which is why I dislike them. So it’s only natural that the studio would want to entice you with a funny joke, a salacious bit of innuendo, or the dangled carrot of “what happens next?” The “Digger” trailer made me ask, “Is this the best two-and-a-half minutes they could carve out of this movie?”

The answer is yes, because there aren’t two-and-a-half minutes of a good movie in this turgid, unfunny, and borderline unwatchable 128-minute mess. The mess isn’t even hot here; it’s as ice cold as the filmmakers think their satire is, and as devastatingly bad as the cataclysmic climate control crisis at the center of its plot.

In fact, this movie is confused about what satire actually is. It can’t tell the difference between the stage play, “Noises Off,” which is a farce, and “Dr. Strangelove: Or How I Learned To Stop Worrying and Love the Bomb,” which is the hilarious and timely satire “Digger” so desperately wants to be.

If you doubt me, know that late in the film, Tom Cruise’s character (who shall remain nameless at this point in my review) actually says, “This isn’t satire, it’s farce!” He then asks, “Why is this funny?,” which led me to write “OK, I’m being trolled” in my notebook. You can find traces of Cruise’s self-deprecating humor if you go back 30 years to “Jerry Maguire” or more recently, to 2008’s “Tropic Thunder,” where Cruise played a character like the one he plays here. But it’s been in short supply since, and it’s clear that director and co-writer Alejandro G. Iñárritu thinks he’s bringing it back.

The script feels as if there was no communication between Iñárritu and the four other credited writers. Even worse, their central conceit is stolen from Preston Sturges’s wonderful 1941 satire, “Sullivan’s Travels.” The big difference is that the great Mr. Sturges had a sense of humor, while Iñárritu has always had absolutely none. His idea of big laughs is having John Goodman’s president of the United States repeatedly scream out “I’ve got cancer in my a—hole!” or reveling in the visual brutality of a raggedy, fake looking cat who is clearly in pain from old age and numerous illnesses, including cancer. Those cancer jokes must have slayed in the writers’ room, folks.

Of course, the poor cat dies. It was the only character worth a damn in this godawful misfire.

I’ve given you enough time to exit this review. As critics, we’re not supposed to reveal spoilery plot points. Mind you, the “twist” in this movie occurs 20 minutes in and changes the entire structure of what happens over the next 108 minutes. Unlike my review for “The Drama,” I refuse to work around the twist here. You were warned.

Turns out “Digger” is the story of the onstage and backstage dramas of a play, one that depicts a real climate-based disaster caused by the world’s most powerful man, Digger Rockwell. An actor in heavy makeup named Curtis (Cruise) plays Digger. I’ve no idea how they expected this concept to work, as this play does not look as if it could possibly be presented on a stage.

What is the point of presenting the movie this way? The backstage shenanigans have no dramatic heft, nor do they contribute anything of worth. A category 6 hurricane, a missing plane, and a lead actor battling the director (Sophie Wilde) are the major elements of the backstage drama, none of which are fleshed out enough for us to care.

However, we do get scenes where people tell Curtis he’s a great actor! The play concept also gives Iñárritu a chance to shoot scenes of audience members giving spirited standing ovations to his own movie’s plot.

The story you were sold in ads is a red herring to get you into the theater to hear endless commentary on climate change and how fossil fuel is ruining Earth and will kill us all if we don’t act. Cruise delivered this important message far more effectively when he voiced Captain Planet on that animated series from the 1980s.

I assumed that the play within “Digger,” called “Fossil Fools,” was meant to be dreadful, but we’re told it’s run for 25 years and has been a huge hit. Meanwhile, on “stage,” everyone from Goodman to Riz Ahmed (as an actor playing an abused Indian scientist) screams incessantly and makes endless speeches. As the actor playing Digger’s onstage sister, Sandra Hüller is shockingly bad. Cruise gets to grandstand and overact in downright embarrassing ways, chewing the scenery with impunity. And there’s a lot of scenery for him to chew: This film was shot in VistaVision.

In addition to pointing out in dialogue every possible criticism one could have with the movie, “Digger” distrusts its audience so much that it literally stops for its actors to explain the movie’s themes to you. One of these themes is that people suffering through a global crisis need something to take their minds off their troubles. That something, as Joel McCrea’s character learned in “Sullivan’s Travels,” is a comedy. I bet Iñárritu and Cruise thought they were offering the same option with “Digger.” By comparison, doomscrolling about the world going to hell is a better use of your time than paying to see this movie. You’ll laugh more, for starters.

A war drama that boldly shines a light on gay love and talent same time is very uplifting in a weird way, so I’m very excited to see the different reactions, how people really connect with the queer vibe, with the Spanish vibe,” he added.

“La Bola Negra” features three intersecting storylines, with the 1932 portion of the film centering on a young man named Carlos (Milo Quífes) who tries to join a prestigious social club, but faces opposition thanks to town gossip about his rumored homosexuality. The second storyline set during the Spanish Civil War in 1937 follows Sebastián — played by Álvaro Lafuente Calvo, a.k.a. Spanish music superstar Guitarricadelafuente, in his acting debut — another young man struggling with his identity while forced to face the terrors of the battlefield as a reluctant soldier for the fascist side. Amid the barrage of warfare, Sebastián forms an intimate bond with captured prisoner Rafael (Miguel Bernardeau), which sets the course for the rest of their lives.

“It kind of represents the impossibility of those times and the frustration, but also the hope, in a way,” Guitarricadelafuente said of how Sebastián and Rafael form a deep connection during “a time where you cannot show vulnerability, and you cannot show any sign of weakness.”

In addition to telling heartbreaking tales about queer love, the film is at times a bloody and violent war story, filled with planes bombing villagers and soldiers fighting on the battlefield. For the filmmakers, it was important that “La Bola Negra” felt epic in scale, something not often seen in LGBTQ+ stories on screen, according to Ambrossi.

“The purpose of this movie is to be big, bold, and go all the way with a big epic war movie, because we don’t have that,” Ambrossi said. “Some people put us in a corner, like, ‘Oh no, LGBTQ+ stories are only for LGBTQ+ people, they are niche,’ and we want to create a big, bold, epic drama for everyone, but with queer characters and with gay love.”

“Gay love is also universal love, and I think that trying to pretend that our stories are niche is saying, in a way, that we are not the same, and we are the same,” he added.

“La Bola Negra” is partly based on the unfinished work of the same name by Federico García Lorca, the famed Spanish poet and playwright, as well as the play “La piedra oscura” by Alberto Conejero, who co-wrote the film with Los Javis. Conejero’s play brought Calvo to tears while reading it during a flight, and mainly informs the Sebastián and Rafael relationship (it also mentions Lorca’s unfinished work, which is what inspired them to explore the writings).

“I started to read it on a plane, and I started to cry suddenly; I didn’t know why, but it touched a wound I didn’t know I had,” Calvo explained. “The civil war was 90 years ago, and we’re talking about the story of our grandparents. So I felt like we had to do something with that.”

“I showed the play to Javi — we saw the play many years ago, and he said, ‘I think you’re right, but maybe we have to make it more complex,’” he added. “In the play they mentioned ‘La Bola Negra,’ the unfinished play of Federico. We started to investigate how the play was gonna be, and we realized it was gonna be his first play about a gay man. So it was like, wow, what a loss, right?”

Lorca’s unfinished play has surprising ties to the film’s 2017 scenes as well, which follows Alberto (Carlos González), a playwright turned historian juggling his research and a strained relationship with his irritable mom (Lola Dueñas). Alberto eventually stumbles upon a surprising secret from his family’s past (González gets to share scenes with New England native Glenn Close, who plays a scholar named Isabelle).

Ambrossi felt that Alberto’s timeline is “the most important part” of the story, as it’s meant to speak to today’s audiences.

“It was very important to make as a question, as creators of the movie, and the question is: Do we pay tribute to the LGBTQ+ people that were killed or that were silenced?” Ambrossi said. “Do we pay tribute for those who fought for our rights? And the answer to me is no.”

“It was very important to intertwine the three stories in order to have a present where the character is free, but he doesn’t know what to do with his freedom,” he added. “We have to honor the past in order to be in a good place with our freedom.”

“This movie also talks about all of these open wounds that this war left for us and that have touched everybody in Spain,” said Guitarricadelafuente, the musician turned first-time actor, who also performs the original song “La nieve” featured in the film.

The cinema newcomer said he met Los Javis in Barcelona one night to discuss the Sebastián role. The filmmakers wanted Guitarricadelafuente for the part as he had “the most beautiful eyes ever” and the musical sensibilities required, as the character plays the trumpet in several scenes, according to Calvo. It was also important for Los Javis to hire a gay performer like Guitarricadelafuente for the role. The directors made a point to use a diverse team both in front of and behind the camera, with Calvo noting the many women and LGBTQ+ people who worked on the film.

“We wanted a gay performer [for Sebastián] because we’re tired of seeing this production that when they get big, they don’t hire queer actors and they hire straight stars,” Calvo said. “I’m not against that. I just think the decision, when you think the movie is big, you can’t have a gay actor, I think it’s because you don’t think gay actors can reach a big audience.”

“It’s a homophobic decision sometimes,” he added, explaining that when he was “a teenage gay actor,” he felt rejection over not landing auditions after he played a gay character on TV. “So I know what I’m talking about. So we needed a gay performer.”

Guitarricadelafuente said he “felt this big responsibility” taking on the role and “was very frightened” since it was his first acting gig, but was put at ease thanks to the confidence Los Javis had in him. He praised costar Penélope Cruz, who plays a performer for the troops named Nené, for her help during their scenes together, calling the experience “a dream come true.”

“She has this super caring personality and this empathetic personality that she helped me so much,” Guitarricadelafuente said. “For Sebastián, she’s like the mother that shows the gateway to the future, and it was something similar with myself.”

Overall, Los Javis hopes the movie can help LGBTQ+ audience members feel seen, as well as break barriers and inspire non-LGBTQ+ viewers to better understand the community.

“Maybe, too, the non-LGBTQ+ people could defend us because they understand us more,” Ambrossi said. “We need allies, and hopefully the movie can reach a lot of people.”

“Godard used to say that the movies of the future will resemble the people who make them,” added Calvo. “I don’t know if this movie looks like us, but it certainly has something from us... from the team and the actors. We really put our souls and our hearts in this.”

‘Verity’ thrives on its soapy severity

By Odie Henderson

GLOBE STAFF

Based solely on the movie adaptations I’ve seen, I’ve concluded two things about Colleen Hoover’s novels. One, her soapy plots are so extreme that even I, a lifelong “All My Children” fan and Mary Higgins Clark addict, find them preposterous. And two, the author has a bigger jones for car accidents than the fetishist characters in David Cronenberg’s 1996 movie, “Crash.” The plot of the last movie based on one of her books, March’s “Reminders of Him,” hinges on a fatal car accident. And 2025’s Hoover adaptation, “Regretting You,” also has a car accident woven into its plot.

Not to be outdone, “Verity” has two car accidents, one of which involves Verity Crawford (Anne Hathaway, in her fifth movie released this year). Crawford is a best-selling author who writes sicko crime novels from the bad guy’s point of view. This Patricia Highsmith wannabe is first seen in a TV interview with Gayle King, who calls Verity’s career “a miracle built on villains.”

Cut to a nearly empty book event hosted by our narrator, Lowen Ashleigh (Dakota Johnson). She’s a Verity Crawford wannabe whose latest book has so little buzz that an attendee interrupts Lowen’s reading to take a phone call. After the disastrous event, Lowen’s agent calls her with some good news: She’s been asked to meet with the same editor who handles Verity’s books. All she has to do is get to Hachette Publishing’s Manhattan office by 3 p.m.

Lowen’s walking commute is interrupted by, you guessed it, a car accident. In a jump scare so ineptly staged that it should have been reshot, a bike messenger is brutally killed by a vehicle. The man’s blood splatters all over Lowen, and director Michael Showalter’s camera circles her in a dramatic 360-degree spin that clarifies that there’s no way in hell this accident could have happened the way it did. No car goes from 0 to 100 on a New York City street.

Even less believable is Lowen’s reaction. She’s less in shock and more concerned that she can’t attend her important business meeting looking like Carrie White after the prom. To her rescue comes Jeremy (Josh Hartnett), a hunky stranger who takes her to a nearby men’s room so she can clean up and change into his dress shirt. This constitutes their Meet Cute because, as we learn a few minutes later when Lowen arrives at her meeting, Jeremy’s last name is Crawford. He’s Mister Verity, and he has a job for her.

You see, Verity is now comatose and can no longer complete her novels. She can neither move nor speak, and she’s being cared for in her vast mansion located in Middle of Nowhere, Vermont. The publisher wants Lowen to finish the latest book in Verity’s massively successful series of gruesome novels, then write the next two. The public has no idea of Verity’s condition, though they are aware that she was in a boating accident that killed one of her twin children. Verity’s condition may be psychological.

Directed by Michael Showalter. Written by Nick Antosca. Starring Anne Hathaway, Dakota Johnson, Josh Hartnett, Brady Wagner. At AMC Boston Common, Landmark Kendall Square, Alamo Drafthouse Seaport, AMC Causeway, suburbs. 114 minutes. R (sex, bloody violence, Grand Canyon-size plot holes)

Even though Lowen is skeptical, I can buy that she’d be asked to continue a series under its creator’s name. V.C. Andrews and Robert Ludlum cranked out books long after they were dead. What I don’t completely buy is that city dweller Lowen agrees to live at this shady estate with a strange man she just met, even if she’s getting half a million dollars. Girl, he might kill you!

If you’ve seen any of the thrillers from the 1980s and 1990s like “The Hand that Rocks the Cradle” or “Pacific Heights,” you have an idea what happens next. Verity may or may not be as incapacitated as she appears, and Lowen may or may not be tacky enough to jump Jeremy’s bones and play stepmom to his surviving son, Crew (Brady Wagner).

Additionally, Verity left a memoir manuscript on a thumb drive that Lowen starts reading. The sinister story gives the film’s biggest star something to do besides lay in a bed — after all, they’re paying her the big bucks, so she better appear in some sexy and violent flashbacks. Hathaway is far more adept at manipulative femme fatale activity than Johnson, so Verity’s scenes pull you into the preposterous plot more than Lowen’s present-day actions. Hartnett is just there for the ride, playing the himbo role to the delight of my audience’s female attendees. They reacted the way you hope an audience would at a thriller like this.

In my one-star review of “Reminders of Him,” I wrote that if “the movie gods are remotely merciful, this horrible adaptation of a 2022 Colleen Hoover novel will top my 10 worst list of 2026.” The gods have no mercy, but they did bless me with an infinitely better Hoover adaptation. In fact, “Verity” would be a total trashy hoot if it weren’t so damn slow-moving. Shave 20 minutes off its nearly two-hour runtime and you’d have a tight and nasty time waster.

No matter. The 2018 novel this is based on was a huge success and, according to the fans I know, it’s the most popular of her books. This one’s for them.

HOROSCOPES

HAPPY BIRTHDAY for Friday, Oct. 2, 2026: You're gregarious, intelligent, and pleasure-loving. You like to inform and guide others. This is a year of building and construction. The structures you build might be internal or external. Simplicity is key. Take charge of your health. Physical exercise will play an important role. Stay grounded and levelheaded.

ARIES (March 21-April 19) This is a creative day for you. Because you're the artisan of the zodiac, tap into your talents and make some art or explore one of your many hobbies. However, avoid intense discussions with partners, spouses, and friends. Keep things light. Tonight: Relax at home.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) In your heart, you want to be helpful to a family situation or whatever is going on at home because you feel sympathetic. However, conversations with others might be too loaded with emotions, too powerful. Skate through this day by avoiding crazy moments. Tonight: Discussions.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20) Power struggles with romantic partners or your kids are par for the course today. Be patient and cut everyone some slack. You don't have to be right. Things don't have to go your way. Lighten up and be gentle. Tonight: Check your money.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) You're a good saver and generally careful with your money. However, today confusion about your money, your earnings, or even something you own might be at play, which in turn triggers family arguments about shared property and shared costs. Run for cover. Tonight: You win!

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) Today you're in touch with your muse, which means your imagination is heightened and you might spend time daydreaming. However, you can also do some wonderful artistic work or explore new ideas. Meanwhile, you might have sympathy for someone and do what you can to help them. Tonight: Enjoy privacy.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Among many things, you are the sign of service, which is why you're willing to help those in need. This quality might arise today if you discover someone who needs your help, perhaps someone behind the scenes. Unfortunately, disputes about money and possessions might also arise. Tricky. Tonight: Be friendly.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Avoid power struggles with others, especially romantic partners, your kids, or anyone in the hospitality industry or the entertainment world. You don't like to rock the boat. You like to keep the peace and keep everyone happy. Protect your own peace of mind today. Tonight: You're admired.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) Your desire to help a co-worker or pet, or to explore self-help care for yourself might be at odds with someone else's ideas, especially someone at home or within the family. Learn as much as you can so you can arm yourself with information to support your ideas. Tonight: Explore and learn.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) This is a romantic and affectionate day for many of you. You also might feel very caring toward children. Even the arts will flourish today. However, an intense encounter with a friend or a member of a group might be a bit overwhelming. Tonight: Check banking and finances.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) You might convince a third party to help you or your family today because you feel concerned. Nevertheless, a conversation with a parent, boss, or someone in authority might be demanding. They might want you to account for yourself. (Yikes.) Tonight: Listen and cooperate.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Steer clear of controversial topics today. These could quickly become power struggles instead of rational discussions. In either case, you might still pursue your desire to help someone in need because your idealism is aroused. (You always want to save the world before bedtime.) Tonight: Get better organized.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) Even though disputes about shared property or how to share expenses might arise today, you will do your best to be supportive to co-workers and people who want to help you. Explore romance and playful opportunities today. Live it up! Tonight: socialize!

This week's deals (and last week's) have focused on the defenders' play. By counting, thinking logically and applying some principles, anyone can defend well.

Cover the West and South cards; defend as East. Against four spades, your partner leads the deuce of hearts. You take the K-A, but declarer ruffs the third heart. He cashes the A-K of trumps — West follows — and next lets the nine of diamonds ride to your jack.

What do you return?

You seem to be stuck between Scylla and Charybdis: Leading a club from your king is risky, and leading a diamond from your king into dummy's A-Q looks suicidal. (Another heart lead may concede a fatal ruff-sluff.)

Count declarer's tricks. He has five spades and one club, so even if he wins three diamond tricks, he will be a trick short. Lead a diamond. South can take three diamond tricks in dummy, pitching two clubs, but you still get your king of clubs.

This was a tough defensive problem. Did you get it right?

DAILY QUESTION You hold: ♠ Q 10 9 5 ♥ 9 6 3 ♦ A Q 10 8 ♣ A 6. Your partner opens one spade, you respond 2NT as a conventional forcing raise, and he bids three hearts. What do you say?

ANSWER: As part of the structure after your 2NT, partner's bid of a new suit shows a singleton there. You can judge whether you have useful or "wasted" honors opposite his singleton. Since you have no waste in hearts, slam is possible. Cue-bid four clubs.

TV CRITIC'S CORNER

SERGEI BACHLAKOV/DISNEY

Zach Braff and Donald Faison in the revival of “Scrubs.” Season 2 is available on Hulu.

‘Camp Miasma,’ ‘Scrubs,’ plus more to stream

Spooky season is in full swing, with plenty of horror fare and other new titles now streaming as we kick off the first weekend of October. From Jane Schoenbrun's latest to an animated series with ties to Anthony Bourdain, here's what to watch.

New movies to stream

‘Evil Dead Burn’ Looking for a good scare this weekend? The “Evil Dead” franchise continues with its latest installment, “Burn,” streaming on HBO Max beginning Friday. Directed by Sébastien Vanicek, the Deadites are back to plague new unsuspecting victims, with the flick centering around a woman named Alice (Souheila Yacoub), who looks to her in-laws for comfort after the death of her husband, only to see them transform into chaos-causing demons. Available on HBO Max

‘The Last First: Winter K2’ The dangerous world of mountain climbing takes center stage in the new documentary “The Last First: Winter K2,” streaming on Apple TV beginning on Friday. The film follows a treacherous climb of K2 in 2021 by Icelandic mountaineer John Snorri Sigurjónsson alongside Ali and Sajid Sadpara, a Pakistani father-son team. Available on Apple TV

New TV to stream

‘Get Jiro!’ For folks in need of more Bourdain after seeing the “Tony” biopic, the new animated series “Get Jiro!” may help scratch that itch. Premiering on Adult Swim at midnight on Saturday (streaming the next day on HBO Max), the show adapts the acclaimed graphic novel of the same name by Bourdain and Joel Rose. “Get Jiro!” is set in an apocalyptic future where chefs hold all the power, with the titular sushi chef character (voiced by Brian Tee) embarking on a mission of vengeance. Available on HBO Max beginning Sunday

Binge-worthy TV pick

‘Scrubs’ It's rare for shows these days to shoot and release new seasons in a timely manner (we're looking at you, “Wednesday”). Thankfully for “Scrubs” fans, the revival of the hit hospital sitcom is already back with a new season, which debuted this week on ABC and streams on Hulu, coming just months after the season 1 finale in April. Kick back with Zach Braff's J.D., Donald Faison's Turk, and the rest of the Sacred Heart gang with a binge-watch of the revival and the original series, which is streaming on Hulu, too. Available on Hulu

Movie night pick

‘Teenage Sex and Death at Camp Miasma’ Following the success of their 2024 horror hit “I Saw the TV Glow,” Schoenbrun returned to the big screen this year with “Teenage Sex and Death at Camp Miasma,” streaming on Mubi beginning on Friday. “Hacks” star Hannah Einbinder plays Kris, a filmmaker tasked with rebooting the fictional “Camp Miasma” slasher franchise, who becomes obsessed with getting the actress (Gillian Anderson) who played the original film's final girl to star in her project. “The relationship between Einbinder and Anderson remains believable even as the film flies off the rails in its final act,” Globe film critic Odie Henderson wrote in his three-star review. Available on Mubi

LOVE LETTERS

BY MEREDITH GOLDSTEIN

I don't want to be coupled if I have to give up peace and quiet

Q. My question is about how I start dating after a very long hiatus during which I learned that I love being alone. I live alone. It's just me and my cat up in an apartment in Vermont. I'm in an area where it's not only difficult to date within my demographic of other young queer women, but I also love my alone time.

That may also be the problem. I love sitting at home reading. I don't really go out that much. A lot of my friends don't live near me or in my state. I spend a lot of time talking to them digitally, but I spend the majority of my time by myself. While I'd love to find a partner and spend time with people in a romantic sense, I am worried that it will infringe on my quiet time, which I really appreciate. How do I get myself back out there in a way that preserves my independence, but also doesn't feel like isolation?

Thank you, Meredith.

QUIET

A. 1. Dating platforms are all about digital communication, so getting back out there via app might feel natural to you. What might frustrate others about the experience — the occasional long lead-up to in-person quality time — might not bother you at all.

2. You live in the middle of nowhere, right? That builds in some space. Set your geographical boundaries for 60 or 70 miles from home. If your place is in Waitsfield (for anonymity's sake, I hope I'm not guessing right) and you date someone in Burlington, you will get your alone time.

3. Years ago, a friend told me that one of the pleasures of being with her husband was that she could feel alone, even if he was right next to her. She could also feel partnered and entertained, but if she wanted to be by herself and read a book, his presence allowed for that. That's one of the reasons she knew he was good for her; she could be introverted in a corner and not have to feel like she was disappointing anyone. He understood her desire for quiet. He liked it, too. They could entertain themselves and then be social when they were ready. You could find someone like that.

Meredith is seeking questions about everything from dating and marriage to life after divorce. Scan the QR code to make your anonymous submission.

By the way, I asked this woman about her marriage because I was worried about my own ability to trade love for quiet time. I do believe what she said — and it makes sense. A great partner for you, specifically, will make room for solitude.

I'll add that as much as a wonderful partner might accept quiet, they might also know you well enough to pull you out of your comfort zone on occasion to say, “It's been a lot of ‘shhhh’ for you. Let's go out together and make some noise.”

READERS RESPOND:

You mention “love” regarding being alone four times, and zero times regarding finding a partner. For some reason you are searching for a partner but you aren't being honest (with us and yourself) about why you want a partner. Come back when you can give an honest answer.

BIGSIGH

Your entire letter emphasizes how great being alone is; the “I want to date” is a mere afterthought buried amongst the pleasures of solitude. Being in a relationship requires the willingness to adapt to someone and incorporate them into your life. I'm not so sure you'd be happy doing that. It sounds more like you'd want to just conjure up a person in the rare instance when you're lonely, then order them to leave when you're through with them. That's not how relationships work.

LUPELOVE

Burlington, Vt. seems like it would have some options for you, and it's probably not an insurmountable distance. There is a difference between being alone and being lonely. If you really want to be alone, then go for it, you don't need permission. But if you want a partner you'll need to leave your cocoon at least temporarily.
