More shark species show up in New England’s warming waters

Two brothers were night fishing on a beach in Falmouth last month when one got a bite. What had been a quiet few hours turned wild when they reeled in a small tiger shark, its vertical stripes vibrant on its blue-gray body.

Just a week before, a boater filmed a 10-foot tiger shark gnawing on a dead leatherback turtle off Popponesset Bay near Mashpee. Three juvenile tiger sharks also swarmed the carcass, sneaking in bites.

A couple of decades ago, close encounters with a species more commonly found in temperate or tropical waters would strike local scientists as an anomaly. Not anymore.

Experts say sightings of warm-water sharks off Cape Cod, the Islands, and Rhode Island are no longer isolated events but further evidence of a seasonal pattern they’ve been tracking for years, one likely brought on, they say, by climate change.

South Coast Rail quickly gains a faithful following

Commuters embrace direct line to Boston

It may have taken three decades and a billion dollars, but for those who live in southern Massachusetts and work in Boston, the South Coast Rail has become a welcome alternative to the stress, expense, and unpredictability of driving.

One of those commuters is Madison Angulo, 22, who on a recent Friday morning boarded the 9:24 train at New Bedford’s Church Street Station. Angulo works as an academic adviser at the University of Massachusetts Boston, and said the train has made it easier for her to work in the city and avoid its exorbitant rents by living in more affordable New Bedford, where she grew up.

Occasional delays aside, taking the commuter rail has saved her money, especially at a time when gas prices are soaring.

“I can commute and save more,” said Angulo, who commutes three days a week.

Angulo is among thousands of residents who have embraced the New Bedford/Fall River-to-Boston commuter line that launched in March 2025. It’s the first time in more than a half-century that communities in the southern parts of the state have been given a direct train to Boston’s South Station, while overcoming funding challenges and some local opposition.

The benefits flow in the opposite direction, as well. The line

Abrupt about-face for TSA on private security model

Scraps program it unveiled only months ago

By Ryley Ober and Christine Chung
NEW YORK TIMES

In May, the Transportation Security Administration announced a new model for privatizing airport security screenings. On Monday, it abruptly scrapped the program.

With a new leader in charge, the TSA announced that it had discontinued its Gold+ program, a private screening model that would have relied on private contractors to staff checkpoints and more quickly install newer technology at airports. The same day, Tampa International Airport in Florida, the largest of the three airports that had opted in to the initiative, said it had decided to stick with TSA agents after a monthslong review of the program.

The TSA will instead move toward what it called an “evolved” version of the Screening Partnership Program, an existing program through which 20 US airports, including San Francisco International, use private security screeners rather than federal keep using existing federal TSA officers for checkpoint screening operations. Emily Nipps, a spokesperson for the airport, said the decision was unrelated to the TSA’s announcement that it was canceling the program.

Two other airports — Charleston International in South Carolina and Des Moines International in Iowa — had the program pulled away from them after signing on. Both airports confirmed they are no longer moving forward with the program, as it no longer exists.

Elliott Summey, the CEO of Charleston’s airport, said it would evaluate the evolved Screening Partnership Program before making a decision about what would work best for its needs. A spokesperson for the Des Moines airport did not respond to questions regarding whether the airport was still considering privatization through the new model.

Caleb Harmon, a former TSA officer who first reported the Tampa announcement in his newsletter Gate Access, called the agency’s abrupt abandonment of Gold+ a “red flag.”

“To deem an initiative as the future of aviation security, and ultimately change course at the drop of a dime, raises concerns,”

‘At this point, there are more questions than answers.’

KEITH JEFFRIES, vice president of K2 Security Screening Group

workers. Few details are known about what this evolved program will look like and why Gold+ was discontinued.

“At this point, there are more questions than answers,” said Keith Jeffries, a vice president of K2 Security Screening Group and a former TSA federal security director at Los Angeles International Airport.

David P. Cummins, who was confirmed as the agency’s new administrator Aug. 7, announced the shift as part of a “new strategic vision” aimed at modernizing the agency. Stated priorities include enhancing the TSA PreCheck program, countering drone threats, and speeding up the process of acquiring new technology.

Initially, officials at Tampa International Airport had expressed optimism about the Gold+ program, saying that it represented an opportunity for “modernization, innovation, and operational resilience.”

In a news release Monday, though, airport officials said they had conducted an extensive review of the program over several months, with the goal of preventing disruptions from government shutdowns and improving access to the latest screening technology.

Ultimately, Tampa decided to Harmon said, adding that the move signaled TSA had announced the program prematurely, or that it had conducted insufficient research to implement it.

Under the Gold+ program, private contractors would have provided the full scope of screening services, technology, and maintenance. Previous implementations of the Screening Partnership Program, like in San Francisco, had only covered staffing.

It is unclear how the new version of the program will differ from Gold+, which was also billed as an evolution of the older partnership program. The TSA did not respond to questions about why Gold+ was rolled back, what will be different about the evolved partnership program, and if there is a timeline for its implementation.

The American Federation of Government Employees, which represents 47,000 TSA agents across the country, said the Gold+ proposal would have been dangerous for the flying public and sued the agency Aug. 5 to learn more about it. The union said it found out the program existed “by accident” after a TSA-branded briefing flier was found at Orlando International Airport in Florida and shared with the media.

Echoes of '63 in civil rights march

Groups call for voting rights before elections

By Matt Brown
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — Voting rights, the work of the civil rights movement, and racial justice took center stage on the National Mall Friday, with protesters gathering ahead of midterm elections and following a wave of changes to voting laws and redistricting that some have condemned as detrimental to Black Americans.

Hundreds of people gathered near the steps of the Lincoln Memorial for the 2026 “Defend the Vote” March on Washington, organized by the Rev. Al Sharpton and Martin Luther King III, echoing the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr.’s 1963 march. The event follows the US Supreme Court’s landmark April decision in Louisiana v. Callais that reinterpreted key provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965, allowing Southern states to redraw their congressional maps in a way that erodes equal representation in Black communities.

“We’ve been doing these marches for years, but this is probably the most important because this is the first year we are marching that the voting rights bill has been nullified by the Supreme Court,” Sharpton, founder of the National Action Network, said in an interview with The Associated Press.

Friday’s event harkened back to King Jr.’s historic March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom in 1963, when more than 200,000 people gathered at the foot of the Lincoln Memorial. That march, an inflection point in the civil rights movement, came at a fraught moment, when economic headwinds, civil unrest, political division, and the Vietnam War bitterly divided Americans.

Senator Bernie Sanders, Independent of Vermont, one of dozens of speakers at the event, said that now is a “very dangerous moment in American history” and that the “dream of a more just and equitable society has never been under greater threat than it is right now.”

He placed blame on Republican President Trump and the Supreme Court’s conservative majority, listing attempts to purge voter rolls, obtain sensitive voter data, restrict mail-in and early voting, and redraw congressional districts as part of threats to voting rights.

“Today, we have a president along with the Supreme Court members he appointed carrying out the most significant assault on voting rights since segregation, targeting virtually every aspect of the electoral system,” Sanders said.

Martin Luther King III told the AP the civil rights movement’s work “is further eroding” in the wake of the April ruling.

He said his father would be disappointed with the state of the country, but current civil rights advocates should be undaunted.

King’s Drum Major Institute, a progressive think tank and community action group, cohosted the march with Sharpton’s group.

Sharpton said the Trump administration’s immigration policy for Haitians and white South Africans, as well as cuts to social programs, are unifying concerns for this year’s march attendees. But redistricting efforts by Republican-led states set to reduce the number of Black lawmakers in Congress loom large.

“This march is about people who refuse to be counted out. When the courts and the legislature broke apart District 6, they did not just redraw lines,” Representative Cleo Fields, Democrat of Louisiana, said in a texted statement. “They told hundreds of thousands of Black families from Baton Rouge up through the Delta that their voice could be taken away at any moment.”

Fields’s district was central in the Supreme Court decision that hollowed out the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The court ruled that his district, created just one term ago to permit a second majority-Black district in a state where Blacks make up 33 percent of the population, was unconstitutional because it relied too heavily on race.

The court has held that maps can be redrawn for partisan reasons.

Louisiana’s legislature rushed to redraw the district after the decision, reshaping it to cluster around predominantly white communities in the Baton Rouge area and southern Louisiana.

Ahead of Friday, organizations participating in the march filed new claims in their federal lawsuit against Trump’s executive order restricting mail-in voting.

Recovered Starship heads for Texas

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — SpaceX has pulled off its biggest salvage operation yet, recovering its most recently launched Starship from the Indian Ocean.

Elon Musk’s company is now in the process of shipping Starship back to its home base in Texas, a trip expected to take several months. SpaceX shared pictures of the recovery effort near Christmas Island late this week.

Starship — the biggest and most powerful rocket in the world — blasted off July 24 from Starbase, Texas.

It was the 13th test flight of a full-up Starship, but unlike all the others, it survived the hourlong space-skimming flight and remained floating and intact.

“Congratulations to the entire SpaceX Recovery team for battling through challenging conditions to give our engineers access to a wealth of data to continue rapidly developing Starship,” the company said via X.

Starship is how Musk intends to get people and equipment to Mars, where he hopes to build a city.

First up, though, is the moon.

NASA is counting on Starship as well as Jeff Bezos’s Blue Moon lander to return astronauts to the lunar surface as early as 2028.

President Trump endorsed both destinations during a visit to NASA’s Johnson Space Center in Houston on Friday.

He also presented the Congressional Space Medal of Honor to each of the four Artemis II astronauts who flew around the moon in April.

Chemical tank flagged before failure

An inspection contractor found a chemical tank at a Washington state paper mill “not fit for continued service” 10 months before it failed in May, killing 11 in one of the deadliest US workplace disasters in recent decades, according to a federal report released Friday.

The US Chemical Safety Board’s update about the May 26 failure in Longview, which expelled enough caustic liquid to blow out building walls, is part of an ongoing investigation. The federal agency said it is still determining the cause of the failure.

The board found that the contractor provided Nippon Dynawave Packaging Co. with recommendations for internal inspections and shell repairs, but the company did none between a July 2025 inspection and the May 2026 failure.

“Because the investigation remains ongoing, we will not comment on individual findings or documents at this time,” an emailed statement from Nippon spokesperson Sam Jefferies said Friday.

Jefferies said the company will continue to cooperate fully with the board.

The Association of Western Pulp and Paper Workers released a statement on Friday saying the board’s findings were “deeply troubling.”

“The update raises urgent questions about how technical findings and recommendations concerning the tank were communicated, evaluated and incorporated into decisions about its continued operation,” the statement said. “The families and workforce deserve a complete accounting of that process.”

Katrina-damaged hospital gets new life

NEW ORLEANS — In the chaos of Hurricane Katrina, Charity Hospital in New Orleans became a scene of heartbreak and heroism, with doctors scrambling to keep patients alive without power or functioning medical equipment while flood waters trapped them inside its darkened halls for days and days on end.

The massive hospital, a New Orleans landmark that long cared for the city’s most vulnerable residents, was closed after the last patients and staff were rescued in 2005.

Now, as Louisiana marks the storm’s 21st anniversary Saturday, the long-vacant storm-damaged building is on the brink of new life.

Tulane University announced this summer that it is spearheading a $500 million effort to convert Charity Hospital into a pioneering medical research facility, transforming the 1930s-era Art Deco building into a downtown hub of biomedical innovation.

Construction is expected to start this fall.

Local leaders have embraced the project in a city where some hospitals have haunted New Orleans since Katrina.

Dozens of patients died at the former Memorial hospital, now known as the Ochsner Baptist Medical Center, after flood waters trapped them inside in sweltering conditions without power.

Demolition crews this month began tearing down another complex, the Lindy Boggs Medical Center, which had sat blighted and vacant for more than 20 years after Katrina.

Ebola outbreak reaches new zones

BUNIA, Congo — The fastest-growing Ebola outbreak in history has spread to two health zones in eastern Congo, with a total of 60 now affected, according to the latest government figures published on Friday.

The two new zones affected are Biena and Manguredjipa in Congo's North Kivu province, where the case fatality rate is much higher than the overall rate of 48 percent, due in part to delayed response efforts, according to Congo's Ministry of Health data.

It said the outbreak has recorded 5,794 confirmed cases, including 2,786 deaths, as it is spreading at an unprecedented speed, faster than efforts to track and slow it.

The World Health Organization has said that it remains out of control and is on track to surpass the 2014-2016 West Africa Ebola outbreak, the deadliest on record, which killed more than 11,000 people.

A search for survivors in Nepal flooding

Almost 2,500 missing and nearly 600 killed

By Niranjan Shrestha and Shristi Kafle

ASSOCIATED PRESS

KATHMANDU, Nepal — Rescuers pulled out survivors caked in dark brown mud and helicopters lifted stranded people to safety, as Nepal and China raced to respond to catastrophic flash floods that killed nearly 600 people and left almost 2,500 missing.

The rescue efforts included a team that rappelled into a severely damaged checkpoint area on the Chinese side of the border between the two countries. Rescuers were on high alert for more flooding from a new lake that formed high up in the Himalayan mountains after the initial floods Wednesday. Experts warned that the lake, created after a glacier collapse that triggered the floods, was starting to overflow.

Nepal's army was deployed to help rescue more than 100 people believed trapped inside a tunnel at a hydropower plant located in the country's worst-hit district. Like elsewhere in the disaster zone, their work was complicated by thick layers of mud that covered the site.

The rappelling rescue team descended into the once-bustling border-crossing area from wooded mountain slopes, the state broadcaster China Central Television said.

“As far as I can see, it's nothing but debris,” rescue official Zou Mingqi told state media. The area where travelers went through border control to enter or leave China has been flattened to a muddy area, according to satellite images.

The floods have killed 579 in Nepal, the country's disaster-management authority said Friday. Nepali police later put the number of deaths at 553. There was little information on survivors on the Chinese side, where the death toll rose to seven Friday as state media showed evacuations of villages and leaders' efforts to direct the relief response.

More than 3,700 people have been rescued in Nepal so far. Meanwhile, the number of people who were unaccounted for in the country nearly doubled to 1,924 as more local residents were added to the tally. China's state media said 554 people were missing on the Chinese side. Hundreds of the missing are foreigners in the area to work, trek, or make a pilgrimage to a sacred peak.

In other developments, Nepal on Friday reversed an earlier decision and said it would allow foreign teams and experts to help with rescue efforts, apparently under pressure from other countries, especially those whose citizens are unaccounted for, a leading English-language newspaper, The Kathmandu Post, reported.

Nepali police issued a fresh alert Friday after receiving information that a dam on the Tibet side had burst. Security personnel and rescue and relief workers were told to stay on high alert and move to a safe location if necessary.

It was unclear if the dam bursting was related to flooding concerns over the lake that formed after the initial flash floods. Chinese broadcaster CCTV said the newly formed lake, located more than 6 miles from Gyirong Port, the hard-hit border crossing with Nepal, sits at an elevation of 9,680 feet.

Nepali and Chinese authorities earlier warned of more flooding from the lake, which was already overflowing. Rescue workers heading to the disaster zone were ordered to stop temporarily Friday because of concern the lake would release more water and debris, and people in potentially affected areas were urged to move to safer ground.

Monitoring data from the Chinese Ministry of Water Resources later showed that the lake had dwindled in size. The water level dropped by 32 feet from the high point on Thursday morning, the state broadcaster said.

Some 680 rescuers eventually reached the Gyirong area by foot and via rafts. Some were dropped from drones flown to the area, CCTV footage showed.

It was not immediately known how many people were at the border checkpoint building when the floods hit.

In Nepal's Rasuwa district, Nepali army rescuers struggled to help more than 100 people believed to be trapped by thick mud in a tunnel that's part of the Upper Trishuli-1 Hydropower Project. The army said it had rescued 350 people from the tunnel so far.

Video from the scene showed rescuers helping a man covered in mud out of the tunnel by pulling and pushing.

“It is complicated to find the entry and exit points of the tunnel because everything has been covered by mud,” Army spokesperson Brigadier General Raja Ram Basnet said.

Nepal's disaster-management authority said 3,253 people had been airlifted by helicopter from the disaster area.

The search-and-rescue efforts have been supported by an outpouring of financial support from neighboring countries, including small, poorer countries like Sri Lanka, said Kanni Wignaraja, the United Nations development agency's regional director for Asia and the Pacific.

“Sri Lanka has its own huge fiscal problems, but it has just sent $1 million immediately to the Nepal government,” Wignaraja said.

Scientists who studied satellite images said bedrock underneath a glacier high in the Himalayan region had collapsed, taking part of the glacier with it. The rockfall was so extreme that it registered as magnitude 5.2. The rocks and melted water then swelled the rivers in the valleys below, causing a torrent of water that swept buildings, bridges, and earth downstream in Tibet and Nepal.

Nepal's tourism board has said that among the missing are more than 500 foreigners.

While the Nepal government shared a public list of people they rescued, there was little information about victims on the Chinese side of the border.

About 90 Americans were unaccounted for.

Six months into war, US aims in Iran remain unmet Residents continue to bear brunt of conflict

By Steven Erlanger

NEW YORK TIMES

BERLIN — It was supposed to be quick.

Still, six months after the United States and Israel launched massive airstrikes on Iran, the conflict drags on. The Trump administration has replaced its military war with an economic one, but the result is likely to be no different, analysts said, with a lack of American clarity about goals, a decline in US credibility, and a strategic defeat.

One thing remains constant, however. The ordinary people of Iran are bearing the brunt of the war, victims of both the United States and their own leaders.

On the first day of the war, Feb. 28, President Donald Trump promised Iranians that “the hour of your freedom is at hand.” Six months later, his administration is trying to impoverish them further, hoping against hope they will revolt against and overthrow a repressive, militarized regime.

The Iranian leadership, increasingly dominated by military men, sees its own survival as the nation's, and it considers the sacrifices of ordinary Iranians as a necessary act of patriotism and even martyrdom. It has been ever more ruthless in stamping out the slightest signs of dissent.

It is hard to dress up what has clearly been a US failure to bend Iran to its will, despite the might of the combined US and Israeli militaries. Not only has the Islamic Republic survived, but it effectively controls the Strait of Hormuz. It has strengthened its influence in the region, with even the countries it was bombing a few months ago trying to reinvigorate ties with Iran.

“The war has failed to deliver US objectives,” said Sanam Vakil, the director of the Middle East and North Africa program at Chatham House.

Suzanne Maloney, an Iran expert and head of foreign policy at the Brookings Institution, judged the war a failure. “We did a lot of damage to Iran, but they have come out stronger than before,” she said. Iran's neighbors have decided they must find a modus operandi with an Islamic Republic that is not going away.

US credibility among allies has suffered along with Trump's own reputation for avoiding costly, interminable wars in the Middle East and promoting “affordability” at home. And it has made his promise to liberate ordinary Iranians look hollow.

“Operation Epic Fury” began with a joint US-Israeli surprise attack on Iran, which killed the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and many of his officials, while badly wounding his son and now successor, Mojtaba Khamenei.

Weeks of intense bombing destroyed much of Iran's air force and navy and badly damaged its missile program. But the population did not rise up and the leadership did not fracture.

Iran's military restored many of its missile launchers and attacked key US allies in the region as well as US bases, which were inadequately defended. It effectively shut down the Strait of Hormuz and caused global economic disruption.

‘There is no clear articulation of America’s goals’

ESFANDYAR BATMANGHELIDJ, founder of the Bourse & Bazaar Foundation

Several thousand Iranians, including children, have died — the numbers are hard to verify — and 18 US service members.

The original “Operation Epic Fury” has been replaced with what Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent on Monday announced as “Operation Economic Outcast,” designed to isolate Iran further and crash its badly damaged economy.

“This is a sustained campaign to collapse every last option for Iran,” Bessent said. “The campaign we begin today will gather force with every day that follows, and it will not end until this regime stands alone.”

Despite rhetorical flourishes about D-Day and the fall of the Berlin Wall, Bessent did not indicate how long this economic war will last, what instruments it will use, or what it aims to achieve.

Is the US goal once again the collapse of the regime? Or to force the opening of the Strait of Hormuz? Or to bring a more desperate Iran back to the negotiating table to reach a sustainable settlement of both the strait and Iran's nuclear program?

“There is no clear articulaother round of US bombing.

Washington is betting it can achieve through intensified economic strangulation what six months of war could not, said Sina Toossi of the Center for International Policy, a Washington think tank.

Washington is trying to do that by demanding international compliance even as its relations with much of the world grow more coercive and transactional, with more countries choosing to ignore Trump's dictates.

“The capacity to hurt Iran is clear,” Toossi said. “The path from pain to capitulation or collapse is not.”

With US objectives unclear, the confusion is real in Iran, too, said Ali Vaez, the Iran project director for the International Crisis Group. They will wonder, he said: “Does the US want to achieve collapse, capitulation, or compromise?”

Given that Iran's leaders see the effort to strangle them as another form of warfare, Vaez said, the new US strategy has two risks. If it fails, the only option left is to return to military escalation. And if it works, it may lead Iran to escalate to break the US naval blockade.

“In either case, it won't produce what the administration seems to want, which is to use sanctions as an alternative to war,” he said. “It's more likely to be a prelude to another round of military warfare.”

Russia continues air assault on Kyiv

Second straight day of strikes forces lockdown

By Hanna Arhirova and Barry Hatton
ASSOCIATED PRESS

KYIV — Russian forces on Friday resumed their drone barrage of Ukraine's Kyiv region, hitting more than a dozen apartment buildings and storage depots in a second straight day of aerial attacks, officials said.

Prolonged air raids in Kyiv on Thursday essentially locked down the Ukrainian capital for 15 hours, the Foreign Ministry said, choking the economy and severely disrupting civilian life more than four and a half years after Russia's full-scale invasion of its neighbor. Even longer alerts are a daily reality in regions closer to the front line, the ministry said.

Russian drone and missile attacks are also taking aim at the power grid in what Ukrainian officials say is an annual campaign to “weaponize winter.” In Ukraine's southern Kherson region on the Black Sea, where glide bombs a day earlier forced a combined heat and power plant to shut down, officials predicted a winter of extended outages and told people to move elsewhere if they could.

Russian strikes in the Kyiv region damaged 14 warehouses, 16 private houses, three apartment buildings, and 16 vehicles, Tymur Tkachenko, head of the Kyiv regional military administration, said Friday.

A second drone hit one location after emergency crews were deployed, the State Emergency Service said, in what is termed by the military as a “double tap” that targets first responders.

The attacks killed one person and wounded two others, according to officials.

The Russian Defense Ministry said that its forces overnight struck a warehouse in the Kyiv region that stores Ukraine's Flamingo cruise missiles and fuel for rocket boosters.

Ukrainian officials didn't immediately confirm the Russian claim, and the Associated Press couldn't verify it. Recent strikes have damaged many warehouses across Kyiv and the wider region, including facilities storing books, food, and other consumer goods.

DARYA NAZAROVA/AFP VIA GETTY IMAGES

Ukrainian responders worked to put out a shopping mall fire after a Russian air attack Friday.

The attacks stretched into daylight hours, and Tkachenko urged residents to stay in safe locations and heed air raid alerts.

Russia is launching small numbers of fast-moving drones in waves in an attempt to paralyze the capital, according to Andrii Kovalenko, head of Ukraine's Center for Countering Disinformation at the National Security and Defense Council.

“The goal is to exhaust air defenses and the population,” he said on social media on Friday.

Kyiv region authorities said that air quality worsened because of the attacks and warned people in some areas to keep their windows closed and limit their time outdoors.

Four Russian glide bombs destroyed a sorting center belonging to the postal service Nova Poshta in the northern Sumy region, and a drone smashed one of its depots in the Kyiv region, the company said.

In the southern Kherson region, which is about 70 percent under Russian control, officials urged tens of thousands of residents to move to safer regions because of the possibility of prolonged power and heating outages this winter.

“Kherson may be without electricity and heat not for hours or days, but for a long time. And we need to prepare for this now,” said Oleksandr Prokudin, head of the Kherson regional military administration, in a social media post late Thursday.

Russia has intensified attacks on critical infrastructure in the region, with 170 glide bombs dropped on the Kherson region since July 1 — more than in the first six months of the year, Prokudin said.

Russia has also launched more than 1,700 attack drones over the past two months, increasingly using jet-powered drones against infrastructure, he said, and attacks by smaller drones rose to 6,500 in the past week alone.

Authorities will offer help with evacuation, transportation, resettlement, and social support for those who decide to leave, he said.

Russia fired 164 drones at Ukraine overnight, Ukraine's air force said. It didn't mention missiles, which usually are part of Russia's aerial attacks.

A 61-year-old man was killed and seven other people were wounded Friday in a Russian glide bomb attack on the northern Sumy region, said Oleh Hryhorov, head of the Sumy regional military administration.

The Russian Defense Ministry said that its air defenses overnight shot down 512 Ukrainian drones over 18 Russian regions, as well as over the illegally annexed Crimean Peninsula and the waters of the Black Sea.

Ukrainian forces struck the Slavneft-YANOS refinery in Russia's Yaroslavl region overnight, causing a fire, Ukraine's General Staff said, as Ukraine continued its campaign against the Russian oil sector.

A fire broke out at the site, which is around 600 miles from the border with Ukraine, the General Staff said. The plant produces gasoline, diesel and aviation fuel, fuel oil, lubricants, and other petroleum products, it added.

A Ukrainian drone attack on Friday morning in the Yaroslavl region killed one person and wounded 27 other people, Governor Mikhail Yevrayev said. Ten of those were wounded when drone debris fell on a bus, he said.

He said that unspecified “industrial infrastructure,” residential areas, and unidentified retail facilities were hit.

In the Moscow region that surrounds but doesn't include the Russian capital, a drone hit a supermarket, damaging it and shattering windows in a nearby outpatient clinic, Governor Andrei Vorobyov said on Telegram.

In the port city of Sevastopol in Crimea, a five-story residential building suffered significant damage from a drone, according to the Russian-installed governor of Sevastopol Mikhail Razvozhayev. Four people were wounded, he said. He posted images of a charred building with windows and balconies knocked out.

Military judge deems key confession in 9/11 case inadmissible

Rules prisoner's statements were not voluntary

By Carol Rosenberg
NEW YORK TIMES

In a major blow to the US case against Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the man accused of plotting the Sept. 11 attacks, a military judge ruled Friday that the prisoner's confessions to FBI agents were not voluntary and cannot be used against him at trial.

Prosecutors have described Mohammed's interrogations in 2007 at the US Navy base in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba, as the government's most crucial evidence in the long-running death penalty case.

The ruling, just before the 25th anniversary of the attacks, could further delay the start of a trial if prosecutors decide to appeal to reinstate it. Aging survivors and families of victims have said they worry they may never see a final resolution to the case.

Just this week, the judge set a trial date of June 5, 2028.

Mohammed is accused of being the mastermind of the hijacking attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people in New York, Pennsylvania, and the Pentagon.

He was brutally interrogated by the CIA in secret overseas prisons after his capture in 2003 and held incommunicado until his transfer to Guantánamo in 2006. Prosecutors excluded statements from those interrogations from the case.

But the trial judge, Lieutenant Colonel Michael Schrama, went further, concluding that Mohammed's subsequent interrogations in 2007 at Guantánamo were also inadmissible.

“The prosecution has failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that Mr. Mohammad's statements to the FBI were voluntarily given,” Schrama wrote in the conclusion of his 45-page ruling, which was not immediately released to the public but whose unclassified contents were confirmed by several lawyers who had seen it.

Schrama cited several factors, including an “unbroken continuation of the CIA's psychological conditioning and severe coercion” at the time of Mohammed's questioning at Guantánamo in 2007.

He also found FBI agents intentionally failed to explicitly tell Mohammed that he had a right to be silent and to consult a lawyer, and that what he told them could be used against him at a trial.

The chief prosecutor, Rear Admiral Aaron C. Rugh, said his team would review the ruling “and will make a decision on whether to appeal in the near future.”

The judge gave prosecutors five days to decide but said they could request an additional five days.

The question of the taint of torture has hung over the case for years.

Defense lawyers had argued that Mohammed was essentially conditioned by the CIA through torture coupled with years of isolation and solitary confinement to later tell the FBI what it wanted to hear. He was not allowed to consult a lawyer until long after he had confessed and was charged.

Schrama has yet to rule on the confessions of two other defendants in the case, Walid bin Attash and Mustafa al-Hawsawi. An earlier judge, Colonel Matthew McCall, threw out the confessions of Ammar al-Baluchi, who is accused of helping some of the hijackers with finances and travel arrangements.

A different judge, Colonel Lanny Acosta, suppressed the confession of the defendant in the USS Cole bombing case, Abd al-Rahim al-Nashiri, in an explicit finding that he had been tortured by the CIA. His death penalty trial in the 2000 attack, which killed 17 US sailors, is scheduled to start in October.

The Sept. 11 case has been mired in pretrial proceedings since arraignment in 2012. Over the years, four other judges gathered evidence on the question Schrama decided Friday. An earlier judge found a fifth man, Ramzi Binalshibh, mentally incompetent to stand trial, a condition the defendant's lawyer blamed on torture.

Is that a solar farm, or a train track? In a Swiss town, it's both.

By Quinn Glabicki
NEW YORK TIMES

More than 3,000 miles of railways crisscross the Swiss countryside, linking Alpine villages to big cities like Zurich and Geneva. It's the most dense rail network in Europe.

Now, a startup company and a local rail operator have found a way to use that land to generate clean electricity: Lay solar panels between the rails.

Starting last April, in the shadow of a craggy mountain-top in the village of Buttes, the company, Sun-Ways, began running a test project on a short stretch of track that proved the idea can work. Similar projects are now expanding to France, Italy, and South Korea.

“This technology is rock solid,” said Valerio Tamellini, project manager at TransN, the Swiss public transit company that hosted the initial pilot project in Buttes.

TransN's test covered only about the length of a football field of track. But if the technology were to be adopted across Switzerland's national rail network, Sun-Ways projects it could power as much as 30 percent of the country's energy needs for public transportation.

In February, the French national railway company SNCF signed a partnership with Sun-Ways to evaluate the technology for its own tracks, which cover about 18,000 miles. “We want to become a big, big solar energy producer,” said Nicolas Phan-Trong, who leads energy and decarbonization projects for the company, which is France's largest landowner and consumer of electricity.

SNCF is testing at least 10 different solar designs and planning a “much bigger installation,” Phan-Trong said. Another potential benefit, he said, is that placing solar panels between the rails prevents weeds from growing between the tracks, reducing maintenance and potentially offsetting part of the cost of the solar installations.

The Sun-Ways design has also been picked up in South Korea, where the government approved a two-year pilot at the Korea Railroad Research Institute's test track last September to evaluate the technology.

In Buttes, the Sun-Ways design uses solar panels that are pinned in place by pistons that press against the steel rails. The concept of installing solar on railbeds isn't entirely novel, according to Joseph Scuderi, the company's founder, and had been explored in more than a dozen earlier patents. But the current design uses pistons to hold the panels in place, enabling them to be moved out of the way for maintenance by a single worker in about 10 minutes.

Increasingly, decisions to expand solar generation aren't constrained by technology or cost, but rather by space. Traditional, ground-mounted solar farms can require 2½ acres of land to generate a single megawatt of power. But building between rails and on top of existing infrastructure solves part of that problem, said Giuseppe Fulco, an Italian engineer and energy consultant.

Fulco said he has negotiated a license with Sun-Ways to launch a test project in Italy in the next year. Fulco estimated that if 20 percent of Italy's railways, or roughly 2,500 miles of track, were used for solar installations like these it would add up to a gigawatt of generating capacity, enough to power up to 1 million homes.

Switzerland and other countries across Europe are pushing to add renewables not only to meet new demand from the electrification of vehicles and to reduce their greenhouse gas emissions, but also to bolster energy independence after the continent weathered an energy crisis wrought by the war in Ukraine in 2022.

Most of the energy could be used by electric trains, Scuderi said. But one complication of the technology is how to move excess electricity to other places where it could be used or fed into the grid. A significant amount of energy could be lost during that transmission process, said Julien Pouget, who studies electrical systems at the University of Applied Sciences Western Switzerland Valais.

Pouget and his colleagues said they are working on a specialized electrical architecture to try to minimize those losses, which could make scaling solar-producing railways far more viable. His research was presented at a summit of power systems in Paris this month, he said.

Another question is cost. Fulco said that could be partially offset because rail companies already own the land, which would otherwise be a major expense. Tamellini expects the economics will be further explored as the Buttes pilot concludes in 2028, and as other projects spring up in other countries. If the price works, he said, “why not deploy it everywhere?”

Trial puts light on need for postpartum care

►SUPPORT GROUPS

to raise a family.
“I just got this motherly feeling, and I just knew I was ready to have kids,” she said.

Preparation didn’t spare her entirely from postpartum depression and anxiety, she said, but it helped. Owens, 31, is now a mother to a 4-year-old daughter and 20-month-old twin girls.

“There are some days that are harder than others, but at the end of the day I know that it was worth it,” Owens said.

Among all women, it’s common to have some level of postpartum mood changes. About 85 percent of mothers experience “baby blues,” according to the Maternal Mental Health Leadership Alliance, a national non-profit advocacy organization. Up to 8 percent report experiencing anxiety disorders, while 14 percent experience depression.

According to trial testimony and legal documents, Clancy began seeking treatment for anxiety, depression, insomnia, and exhaustion about three months after her youngest child, Callan, was born. Over the course of five months, Clancy received 30 prescriptions for 13 different drugs but didn’t experience consistent relief from her symptoms.

A 2018 study found that women with a history of depression are 20 times more likely to experience postpartum depression than women without that history.

That doesn’t mean all women who have a history of mental illness will suffer serious illness if they become parents. And though she reported previous bouts of anxiety, Clancy wasn’t diagnosed with a mental illness until after the birth of her third child.

But preparation with health care professionals, a strong support system, and strategizing for stress reduction and healthy sleep during the postpartum period can improve the chances of avoiding a crisis and resolving symptoms more quickly, advocates said.

One other factor: Perinatal women with mental health conditions are less likely to reach out for assistance, a reluctance that could stem from a lack of insight into their own condition, the stigma attached to mental illness, or fear that admitting to difficulties could cause them to be reported as a risk to their children.

“We want to normalize talking about mental and emotional health,” said Wendy Davis, chief executive of Postpartum Support International, a perinatal health organization based in Pennsylvania. That means “making plans to support emotional and mental wellbeing just the same way we talk at every appointment about blood pressure, nutrition, childbirth, accident prevention.”

She emphasized finding a peer support system, ideally making connections with other women who have experienced postpartum challenges.

In Massachusetts, advocates say, finding help can be a challenge, with access varying depending on where a new parent lives, who her provider is, and whether the program is recommended by community members. There does not appear to be a public clearinghouse of postpartum depression support groups operating in Massachusetts.

N.Y. woman found not responsible for killing her 2 sons

By Maria Cramer and Emily Palmer
NEW YORK TIMES

NEW YORK — She was naked from the waist up, sitting on a bed and holding a children’s book upside down when police found her in a Bronx shelter on Nov. 26, 2022, according to prosecutors.

The woman, Dimone Fleming, 22, had repeatedly stabbed her sons, Octavius Canada, 11 months, and Daishawn Fleming, 3, and then submerged them in a bathtub full of water.

On Monday, nearly four years later, prosecutors and a lawyer for Fleming, now 26, agreed that she was in a state of psychosis when she killed her children. A judge found her not responsible by mental disease or defect. As a result, she will avoid prison, but could be hospitalized for months, if not years, if doctors determine she is still mentally ill.

The resolution, reached quietly in Bronx Criminal Court, came as national attention has been focused on the trial of Lindsay Clancy, a Massachusetts woman charged with killing her three young children in 2023.

In the Bronx case, prosecutors, who had initially charged Fleming with first-degree murder, said that trying her for the killings and seeking a prison sentence would not serve justice.

“Prosecuting mothers does not and cannot prevent these crimes from happening, but public discourse might,” Tiffany Wichman, a Bronx assistant district attorney, said in an interview after the judge, Audrey Stone, accepted the plea.

In November 2022, Fleming was working at a concession stand in Flushing Meadows in Queens and living in a shelter in the Mount Hope neighborhood of the Bronx with Octavius and Daishawn. Columbus Canada, then Fleming’s boyfriend and Octavius’s father, lived with her and the children at the time.

For about two months, Fleming had been going to the Floating Hospital in Queens, where she was being treated for symptoms of anxiety and depression, according to court records. Doctors gave her a diagnosis of major depressive disorder and prescribed her psychotropic medication.

But she was not taking the medicine and instead was using marijuana daily, which exacerbated the symptoms, according to court records.

The night she killed her children, Fleming was “grossly psychotic and out of touch with reality,” Dr. Eric Goldsmith, a psychiatrist who evaluated her at the request of prosecutors, wrote in a report.

She stabbed her children with kitchen shears, then placed them in the bathtub where she covered them with a sheet.

Support International, and Jewish Family & Children’s Service — while also suggesting parents look to hospitals, libraries, and community organizations.

That decentralized system can pose challenges, particularly for mothers seeking in-person or culturally specific support.

“I don’t think there are enough, honestly,” said Stephanie Crawford, founder of Roxbury-based Propa City Community Outreach, which supports families affected by pregnancy and infant loss and works with mothers across Massachusetts.

Crawford was one of 35 organization leaders who applied for DPH funding to “address mental health conditions and substance use disorders among perinatal individuals.”

Five organizations were chosen: Monumental Beginnings (Falmouth Together We Can), Building Stronger Beginnings (Cooley Dickinson Hospital, Moms Do Care – Northampton), Vital Connections (Boston), Worcester RISE for Health, and Writing by Michelle LLC (Haitian Mental Health Network and William James College). They’ll each receive $44,000 annually over the next five years.

Davis emphasized that people should seek out virtual groups if one isn’t available locally. Her organization offers hundreds of national online support groups, she said.

Expecting mothers who had treatment for mental health conditions in the past or are receiving treatment currently should consult health care professionals about perinatal care. That could include a psychiatrist, doctor, or other health care provider, said Dr. Michelle DiBlasi, an assistant professor of psychiatry at Tufts University School of Medicine.

A major question, experts said, is whether to continue taking medications for mental health care during pregnancy and breastfeeding. A lot of the most common medications for depression, anxiety, or bipolar disorder are safe for pregnant and new mothers, but the specifics should be discussed with a doctor.

“It needs to be a conversation between the provider and the patient, ideally even before the person gets pregnant, about what the plan would be,” DiBlasi said.

Owens, the Belmont parent, began seeing a therapist in high school, and had conversations with both a therapist and a psychiatrist before her first child’s birth. With the exception of a prescription for ADHD, Owens stayed on medication during her pregnancy and while breastfeeding, she said.

“A healthy mom is better than a mom who’s struggling,” she said.

She still experienced symptoms of anxiety and obsessive-compulsive disorder after her first birth, she said.

“I was checking on breathing all the time, what she’s eating. When she started foods, I would worry about if she was choking,” Owens recalled. “I felt like that anxiety consumed my life.”

After her twins were born, she said, her anxiety was replaced by depression and difficulty connecting with her babies, she said.

“I felt like sometimes they weren’t my children and they were just children I was taking care of,” she said.

She was able to talk about those feelings with a therapist, who told her they were normal. As time passed, she has gotten better at connecting with her youngest children, she said.

Her experience during her first pregnancy also made her better at managing her stress after her twins’ births. She and her husband took shifts overnight that allowed each of them to get four solid hours of sleep. Her mother was involved immediately after the births of the twins, she said. And Owens became more comfortable telling people she wasn’t ready for visitors.

Now, she said, she still struggles with periods of depression, but finds comfort in communicating in those moments.

“The most important thing is telling someone how I feel,” she said. “It’s still a work in progress.”

Governor balks at election monitors

2 DOJ overseers at Wyo. primaries

NEW YORK TIMES

Two election monitors from the Justice Department tried to interview voters and examine voting machines at polling places during Wyoming’s primaries last week, local officials said, drawing pushback from the state’s Republican governor.

The federal election monitors arrived at a polling site in Cheyenne, Wyoming’s capital and its largest city, without advance notice around 7 a.m. Aug. 18, said the Laramie County clerk, Debra Lee. They asked to interview voters and inspect the machines, but were denied, officials said.

“It was aggressive, unexpected, disruptive — certainly didn’t seem to show respect for the state,” Governor Mark Gordon of Wyoming said in an interview Thursday. “We’re going to get to the bottom of it as best we can.”

The Justice Department often monitors polling sites during elections. But the visits to Wyoming came amid President Trump’s ongoing fixation with finding evidence of fraud and vote tampering. Trump and his allies made fantastical claims that voting machines had switched votes for him to his opponent Joe Biden in 2020, and he has tried and failed to find evidence of widespread fraud or vote tampering ever since.

Trump has often returned to such conspiracy theories in his second term, arguing that widespread fraud could affect this year’s elections. As president, he has deployed the resources of the federal government, notably the Justice Department’s, to investigate his unsubstantiated claims, sowing more doubt in the nation’s elections and raising alarm among state officials about whether he will try to intervene if Republicans lose their congressional majorities in November.

Gordon, a low-key, term-limited Republican who leads one of the country’s most conservative states, said at a meeting with state election officials Wednesday that he had been concerned by the behavior of the election observers.

“I feel very strongly about the federal government coming in and taking our guns — I don’t like that,” Gordon said at the meeting. “And I don’t like the federal government coming in and taking our votes, either.”

The monitors ultimately visited six polling places, showing their credentials only when asked for them, Gordon said in the interview, describing their behavior as “very odd.” He said he had asked the state attorney general, Keith Kautz, to investigate the matter.

The observers had cited statutes related to the Americans with Disabilities Act and the Civil Rights Act, Gordon said.

This year, the Justice Department’s observers have visited polling places in other states, including politically tense regions such as the Minneapolis area. The agency said Tuesday that it had sent 80 monitors to seven states during primary season.

But the requests to interview voters and gain access to machines in Wyoming were unusual. And they come at a moment when the Justice Department has been locked in an intense legal battle with roughly 30 states, demanding their private, unredacted voter rolls in a hunt for evidence of noncitizen voting.

In early July, the Justice Department sent letters to every state and Washington, warning that top election officials would be criminally prosecuted if they allowed ballots to be cast by non-citizens.

The monitors in Wyoming said they had been sent to assess whether the election was in compliance with federal civil rights and voting rights laws, Lee said. But their questions appeared to be “outside the scope of federal voting rights laws,” she said in a statement.

Their conduct, Lee said, displayed a “complete disregard for our state laws and administration of our elections.”

Controversy erupts over reporting of measles deaths in Pa.

By Teddy Rosenbluth
NEW YORK TIMES

In the week after Pennsylvania reported its first measles deaths in 35 years, controversy erupted as anti-vaccine activists and some public officials raised questions over whether the patients died from measles or happened to have the virus when they died from something else.

The conflict has centered around one of the deaths, a newborn who tested positive for the virus and died shortly after childbirth. The infant’s mother also tested positive for measles, said Dr. Stephen Diamantoni, the Lancaster County coroner, in an interview. A forensic pathologist performed an autopsy and determined that the immediate cause of death was a lacerated spleen, he added. Neil Ruhland, a spokesperson for the Pennsylvania Department of Health, said that as the body responds to a measles infection, the spleen can become enlarged, making it more vulnerable to injury and rupture.

The deaths set off a public battle between Pennsylvania’s Democratic governor, Josh Shapiro, and Robert F. Kennedy Jr., the nation’s health secretary.

In a news conference Tuesday announcing the deaths, Shapiro accused Kennedy of contributing to the state’s measles crisis by spreading misinformation.

The next day, Kennedy shot back on the social platform X, claiming the measles deaths in Pennsylvania “may have even been altogether fabricated by one of the Governor’s hopeful staffers.”

In a statement posted on X, Dr. Debra Bogen, Pennsylvania’s health secretary, defended the department’s announcement, writing that she has “thoroughly reviewed the case investigation” and “sadly can confirm that there were two recent measles-associated deaths.”

But the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention released a statement applauding Kennedy’s “efforts to clarify conflicting information from Pennsylvania officials about whether the two reported deaths were caused by measles.”

The statement added, “CDC is working to determine what actually occurred.”

Further complicating matters, Diamantoni, a Republican who was last elected county coroner in 2023, said the pathologist who performed the autopsy did not determine measles to be a cause of death nor did he find evidence of an enlarged spleen.

Ruhland said that in a measles-related death, the virus is not necessarily listed as the immediate cause of death, even though the infection may be a contributing factor. He compared it to a death from a drug overdose: The immediate cause of death may be respiratory or cardiac failure, but the overdose contributed.

Dr. Paul Offit, director of the Vaccine Education Center at Children’s Hospital of Philadelphia, said this discourse over whether someone died from an infection or with an infection is a common talking point within anti-vaccine circles that cropped up during the COVID-19 pandemic, as a way to downplay the seriousness of the illness.

Several prominent figures in anti-vaccine circles also latched onto the phrase “measles-associated deaths,” which they suggested health officials were using to hide the fact that the virus did not play a role in the reported deaths.

“The difference between a measles-associated death and a death due to measles is pretty semantic,” said Dr. Andrew Pavia, a pediatric infectious disease specialist in Utah.

Trump touts 65 billion-barrel oil deal with Venezuela

WASHINGTON — President Trump on Friday said the US has entered an agreement with Venezuela to take control of 65 billion barrels of the South American country's oil reserves.

Trump in a social media post announced the agreement he said was negotiated by Secretary of State Marco Rubio, Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth, and Venezuela's interim President Delcy Rodriguez.

"The United States of America has just entered into an Agreement with the Country of Venezuela on, THE BIGGEST OIL DEAL IN WORLD HISTORY!" Trump wrote.

The announcement of the deal comes nearly nine months after the US military at Trump's direction carried out an operation to capture Venezuela's president Nicolás Maduro and spirit him to the United States to face federal narcoterrorism and drug trafficking charges.

Trump faces mounting pressure to address high gas prices as the war in Iran reaches a six-month milestone with no conclusion in sight. The US has tapped its strategic petroleum reserves, which in early August fell below 300 million barrels, down by more than 100 million barrels since the start of 2026.

In the days following Maduro's ouster in January, Trump floated the idea of US oil companies returning to Venezuela to tap its oil reserves. Trump has argued that Venezuela stole US oil when former Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's moved decades ago to nationalize hundreds of foreign-owned assets, including those owned by American oil companies.

Venezuela has one of the largest oil reserves in the world, with an estimated 303 billion barrels of crude oil in the ground. That's about 17 percent of the world's supply, according to the US Energy Information Administration. Unlike other parts of the world, where geologists have to search for untapped oil, the reserves under Venezuela's soil are largely mapped and known, experts say. But because of dilapidated infrastructure, the country produces only about 1 percent of the world's oil.

Administration appeals hold on mail ballot restrictions
WASHINGTON — The Trump administration on Friday appealed a freeze on President Trump's plan to restrict mail-in voting, teeing up another series of legal decisions about whether the US Postal Service can make changes to how ballots are handled before the midterm elections.

The issue will likely be settled by the Supreme Court.

The administration's appeal came less than a day after a federal judge in Massachusetts found that a Postal Service rule published last week was likely unconstitutional and exceeded the agency's authority. Under the rule, the Postal Service would not deliver mail ballots in states that do not share voter data with the agency, and would only deliver ballots that meet certain criteria.

The Supreme Court has considered the issue once already, finding that it was too soon for litigants to challenge an executive order issued by Trump in March because the Postal Service had not yet taken steps to carry it out.

But after the Postal Service published its plan last week, more than 20 Democratic state attorneys general and a coalition of voting nonprofits and organizations returned to court with a more concrete challenge.

The Trump administration had argued that the Postal Service plan would not give the agency an overly intrusive role scrutinizing voters or regulating election mail.

Judge says president's hush money conviction stands

NEW YORK — A federal judge on Friday once again spurned Donald Trump's effort to erase his hush money conviction, rejecting the president's bid to move the state court case to federal court and have it dismissed on presidential immunity grounds.

Judge Alvin K. Hellerstein said Trump's reasons for renewing his request were "neither new nor legally sufficient," particularly his claims that trial testimony by former aides and a lawyer, along with his Twitter statements, infringe on presidential immunity.

"They do not; paying hush money to an adult film star or engaging in a cover-up of an embarrassment are not subsumed in presidential immunity," the judge said, referring to the $130,000 payoff to adult film actor Stormy Daniels.

By midafternoon Friday, Trump's legal team had notified the lower court it was appealing the ruling.

Proposal to trade Yosemite parcel draws criticism

The Trump administration has proposed trading away a small parcel of land in Yosemite National Park in California so a private developer can gain access to the park, according to federal officials and documents reviewed by The New York Times.

The potential deal has alarmed conservationists and former National Park Service officials, who say that Yosemite, the crown jewel of the nation's park system, should be off-limits to development.

The proposal calls for transferring a parcel just inside the park's western boundary to a company controlled by Kingsbarn Realty Capital, a real estate private equity firm. Kingsbarn wants to build a road and develop two 40-acre parcels it owns near the park, according to documents submitted to Congress and reviewed by the Times.

In exchange, the company would purchase land of equivalent value, either near Yosemite or elsewhere in California, and hand it over to the park service, the documents show.

"This is so ridiculous, it makes you sick," said Don Neubacher, a former supervisor at Yosemite who is now on the executive council of the nonprofit Coalition to Protect America's National Parks. He said a similar proposal was raised in the early 2000s. It was rejected, by the park service and later in court.

"How we doing, baby?" she asked Kashawn Little, a Democratic ward chair.

"I already talked to your brother, who looks just like you," she told Lynn City Councilor Fred Hogan.

"I'll see you soon, you two," she said after taking a photo with a girl with a Minions-themed kite, whose mother had Belsito's sign on her house.

"I just love running into everybody," the Topsfield town moderator and former state representative said after greeting Katherine Rushfirth, the wife of Lynn Mayor Jared Nicholson, in between gushing over dragon kites and Powerpuff Girls-themed popsicles.

Yet, in between smiles, Belsito has increasingly gone on the offensive against better-funded candidates, criticizing those they've taken money from. Belsito has centered her "all grass-roots" campaign, which had knocked on nearly 50,000 doors, on rejecting money from pro-Israel groups, casting herself as the field's progressive choice.

"She is the candidate I'm looking for in terms of progressive values," said Melissa Brusil, the Lynn mother who said she has a Belsito sign. Her next representative, she added, "needs to be outspoken."

'Salem magic'

SALEM — In the span of an hour last Saturday afternoon, Tram Nguyen joined a pirate captain's crew, petted a dog in a barber shop, and got lemonade beside a highway from a mom in a lobster hat.

The Andover state representative embarked on a journey, ahem, tour of Salem's downtown businesses alongside state Representative Manny Cruz — one of 50 Beacon Hill colleagues who have backed her bid.

With a small microphone attached to her shirt, every "business crawl" stop was an opportunity to tout her legislative chops.

At the pirate museum, the museum's owner encouraged Nguyen to touch uncovered pirate treasure. "Maybe this brings you good luck," she said. "A little bit of Salem magic for this race," Cruz joked.

Next: Cruz's preferred barbershop, whose owner he went to high school with — and which had a Beccia sign in the window. Nguyen asked if she could add hers to the row.

"I'm the only one in this race that has that legislative experience," Nguyen told owner Ezequiel Dominguez.

Then, at a lemonade stand run by 8-year-olds Graham Weaver and Stella Dubiel, no one was exempt from Nguyen's pitch.

"Go and vote — well, not you," she said, laughing.

Nothing artificial

LYNN — Bethany Andres-Beck has been running far longer than any other candidate in the race. But on the first day of early voting late last Saturday afternoon, they were struggling to convince people an election was taking place at all.

"How are you thinking about politics these days?" Andres-Beck asked a woman at Lynn's Floating Paper Lantern Festival who'd come to decorate colorful paper lights.

"I'm not really," she replied.

It's part of the uphill climb the Middleton resident has tried to chip away at with every "I'm a software engineer, and I want to regulate AI" introduction since first announcing they were challenging Moulton — and before Moulton challenged US Senator Ed Markey.

Yet in Andres-Beck's telling, joining Congress is no longer the only point of the campaign.

"This is worth doing, whether or not I win, especially getting the AI policy ideas that otherwise wouldn't even be on the table," Andres-Beck said. They pointed to voters who had told them, with frustration, that they couldn't reach their doctors without encountering an artificial intelligence-powered chatbot or had gotten "scammed out of $1,000" by one.

They just want people to know, Andres-Beck said, that "you're not alone."

Dan and co.

LYNN — Dan Koh is on a mission to shake any and every hand in any and every crowd.

Koh worked through hundreds at the Floating Paper Lantern Festival last Saturday evening, asking questions of or offering hugs to anyone, infants and dogs included.

It's a skill he learned from onetime Boston mayor and former US labor secretary Marty Walsh — and then honed since losing in the crowded Third District primary eight years ago.

"When you lose by 145 [votes], you remember 145 people that you might not have reached out to," he said.

But this time, Koh's got back-up. His 6-year-old daughter, Theo — pink, scribble-adorned lantern in hand — greeted voters, along with his wife, Amy Sennett, and 3-year-old son, Jack. He's run weeks of TV ads and sent as many mailers as the $4.7 million he's reportedly raised can buy.

That notoriety comes with a price. A protester, wearing a keffiyeh scarf, followed Koh for several minutes, shouting: "This is a candidate that takes money from AIPAC. He's not standing up for the Lebanese people."

"That's not true," said Koh, who hasn't received funds from the pro-Israel PAC.

Then, he resumed introductions: "Hi, my name's Dan Koh."

Song sung blue

SALEM — In the back of Deacon Giles Distillery, surrounded by friendly faces and an assortment of cocktails, Mariah Lancaster took the stage last Saturday night.

Samantha Jane, Lancaster's campaign finance director, had asked them what final event they wanted to put on ahead of Sept. 1. "Karaoke," Lancaster said.

Convention is not Lancaster's strong suit. The veterinarian-turned-State Department-officer-turned-congressional-aide returned to Massachusetts after seeing "learned helplessness and complacency" among colleagues following President Trump's election.

"We are understanding in the pit of our stomachs how much damage this administration is doing," Lancaster said.

So there Lancaster was, knees bent, belting Kate Bush's "Running Up That Hill," with a supporter harmonizing beside them. Two dozen people whooped as they sipped drinks around signs reading, "Get Mariah to sing a song," with a QR code for an ActBlue donation page.

"This is what running for Congress feels like," quipped Lancaster, nodding to the song's feature in the show "Stranger Things." At 36, they're the field's youngest candidate and its "only renter."

"I've had competitors who have millions say to me, 'Wow, if you had $2 million, you'd be scary,'" they told the Globe. "You can't buy genuine enthusiasm."

So they sang on.

The BSO says it wants dialogue. So let’s have one.

By George A. Whiting

George A. Whiting is cofounder of the BSO Patron Action Network & Red Flower Campaign.

Recently, I unexpectedly met Barbara Hostetter, chair of the Boston Symphony Orchestra’s Board of Trustees, at Tanglewood. When I introduced myself, she told me she knew who I was and what I was doing and, in substance, that there was no chance director Andris Nelsons would be reinstated.

For the past several months, I’ve been one of the cofounders of the Red Flower Campaign, a grass-roots effort that began after the BSO announced that Nelsons’ tenure would end following the 2026–27 season. It started as a way to show support for Nelsons and the musicians, but quickly became something larger: a conversation about musicians having a voice in artistic decisions, transparency in governance, and whether patrons are viewed as members of an institutional community or simply as consumers whose role ends at the concert hall door.

Hostetter told me that the institution needed to reunite and be repaired “with respect and dialogue,” while questioning whether the red flower represented support for Nelsons rather than for the orchestra. I told her what we have said from the beginning: Those things are not mutually exclusive. We support Nelsons, we support the musicians, and we support an institution willing to engage honestly with the people who care about it. But how can we begin a dialogue by announcing what cannot be discussed?

So let me be clear about what the Red Flower Campaign is asking for. We want the board to reconsider its decision and reinstate Nelsons. We want greater transparency and accountability from the board — beginning with a public accounting of how this decision was made and a genuine conversation with the musicians, patrons, and community whose trust has been shaken.

The musicians did not have any role in the Board of Trustees’ February decision concerning Nelsons and learned of the decision more than a month later, alongside donors, the press, and the public. That history makes the new three-year contract especially significant. The contract strengthens the musicians’ role in artistic planning and gives them a greater voice in the engagement of titled conductors, including the next music director.

Since March, more than 4,000 people have signed the Red Flower Campaign’s petition and nearly 12,000 red flowers have been distributed. I have met lifelong subscribers, students, retirees, young professionals, musicians, small-business owners, and people who have never participated in anything resembling advocacy before who have all been eager to show their support. They care about the orchestra.

During my visit to Tanglewood, I heard the same message from Hostetter and a member of the BSO’s Board of Advisors: Nelsons would not be reinstated. Two Red Flower Campaign volunteers separately reported similar encounters with a BSO trustee and a member of the orchestra’s staff. The consistency was striking. When an institution speaks repeatedly about dialogue while emphasizing what has already been decided, what does “dialogue” actually mean?

The same tension appears elsewhere. People connected to the orchestra continue to ask reporters not to use their names. A Tanglewood Music Center fellow asked one journalist for anonymity because of concern about possible repercussions.

For years, arts organizations have talked about attracting younger audiences, expanding participation, and welcoming communities that historically did not see themselves reflected in institutions like Symphony Hall. I am one of those people. I am younger than the traditional classical-music subscriber. I am Filipino American. I am queer. I am a musician. I did not inherit a lifelong relationship with the BSO; I developed one because the music made me want to belong.

But inclusion cannot simply mean getting new people through the door. It also means accepting that once they arrive, they may ask difficult questions. Otherwise, we are not building community. We are building an audience that is welcome only as long as it behaves predictably.

The Red Flower Campaign began because of what happened to Andris Nelsons, and his reinstatement remains one of our goals. But what happened has also exposed questions much larger than the fate of the organization’s music director.

How are its leaders held accountable? Are the people who sustain the institution truly participants in its community, or simply treated as an audience to be managed?

The red flower does not mean choosing Nelsons over the orchestra. It means believing that the heart of the orchestra is the musicians, conductors, and composers who create the work we come to hear; that the musicians’ new contract is an important step toward recognizing that principle; and that artistic excellence is worth protecting. But the agreement does not erase the questions of trust and accountability that brought the BSO to this moment. Those entrusted with governing the institution still owe those artists and the public more than decisions handed down from above. They owe them a voice, a willingness to listen, and an honest accounting of how decisions are made about the orchestra’s future.

On Dolly Parton, motherhood, and my diamond engagement ring

MARCELA GARCÍA

I fell in love with my engagement ring at first sight. It’s a classic double-halo design with a rare round champagne diamond, brilliant-cut, at its center.

I know admitting how much I love a piece of jewelry makes me sound shallow and materialistic. Wait until I tell you that my husband didn’t actually choose the ring — I did. But him asking me to pick what I liked was a sign that he understood who I was: someone who wanted a say in the symbols of her life.

A few years later, when I realized after three failed rounds of IVF that we weren’t going to have a baby, one of the many things I mourned was that I wasn’t going to have a daughter who would inherit my cherished ring. I’m a little ashamed to confess that, inevitably, I would take that thought one, two, a million steps further, falling for the existential question: What is my legacy going to be, if not a child to carry me forward — my name, my stories, my ring — into a future I won’t get to see?

Dolly Parton, who died Tuesday at 80, wrestled with that same question, and then answered it as expansively and generously as anyone ever has.

Parton didn’t shy away from speaking publicly about why she and her husband, Carl Dean, didn’t have children. The couple was married for nearly 60 years. “Early on, when my husband and I were dating, and then when we got married, we just assumed we would have kids,” she told Billboard in 2014. “We even had names.”

Parton reportedly suffered from endometriosis in the 1980s and had a partial hysterectomy, which typically causes infertility. She was in her late 30s at the time, just as her career was reaching its dizzying peak. By then, she had outgrown country music stardom: She had written “Jolene” and “I Will Always Love You” in 1973 — possibly in a single day; and “9 to 5,” her film debut and its famous theme song, had topped the charts, earned her an Oscar nomination, and turned her into a mainstream icon in the United States.

The singer spoke publicly about being depressed and suicidal as a result of the infertility. “It was an awful time for me when I realised there would be no babies,” she told the then-Evening Standard, a British publication, in 2012. Yet she persevered and pivoted, relying on her Christian faith to carry her through.

Here’s where Parton’s story turns remarkable. She established the Dolly-wood Foundation in 1988, pouring her fortune into robust philanthropic endeavors. It’s as if she had put her money where her grief was.

In the early 1990s, Parton created a literacy initiative, the Buddy Program, that provides $500 to eligible students in Sevier County, her home county in Tennessee, who graduate from high school. The dropout rate fell from 35 percent to 6 percent.

Later, in 1995, she founded the Imagination Library in honor of her father, who never learned to read. The program mails a free book per month to enrolled children from birth to age 5, regardless of income. According to the program, more than 330 million books have been gifted across the United States, Canada, United Kingdom, Australia, and Ireland.

She’s also donated generously to medical research, including $1 million that helped fund early research behind Moderna’s COVID-19 vaccine and another $1 million to fund pediatric infectious disease research. After wildfires devastated her home county in 2016, the relief fund she created and seeded raised more than $12 million, according to the Dollywood Foundation, giving about $10,000 to each family that lost its home.

It’s as if Parton took the grief of the motherhood dream she was denied and converted it into mothering at scale, in the process redefining what a legacy can look like for childless people like me, and for those who are child-free by choice. In doing so, she quietly dismantled an expectation that has been weaponized against women — and internalized by us — for centuries: that our worth and legacy is measured in descendants. It took me a while but now I get it: children aren’t one’s legacy. They’re not monuments to their parents or vessels for our ambitions or expectations.

Parton, too, once believed that having a child was her “duty as a woman.” Instead, she proved to everyone that mothering does not require childbearing. “God has a plan for everything,” she said on the Today show in 2017. “I think it probably was his plan for me not to have kids so everybody’s kids could be mine. And they are now.”

If you must know, my champagne diamond will go to my stepdaughter, who loves shiny, beautiful things just as much as I do. As for honoring Parton, I’ll leave the musical tributes to the experts. I will remember her instead as the woman who helped me see what my engagement ring had symbolized all along: choosing for yourself, which Dolly did her whole life. And she answered the legacy question I once asked over my ring: No one carries you into the future. You carry yourself there, in what you give away.

Mass. can’t lose lead in medical breakthroughs

By Abbie Celniker, Bob Tepper, and Kendalle Burlin O’Connell

Abbie Celniker and Bob Tepper are partners at Third Rock Ventures. Kendalle Burlin O’Connell is CEO and president of MassBio.

The path was never obvious. But 30 years ago, Massachusetts made a bet on uncertain, early science — the kind that takes years to prove out and is easy to walk away from.

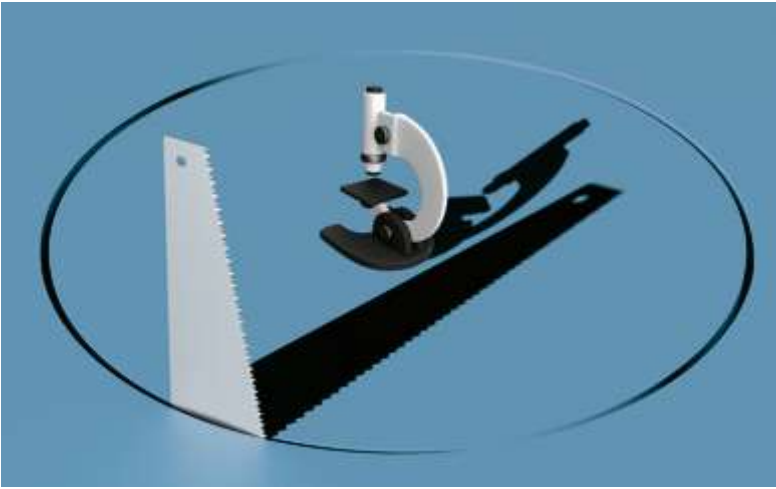

The scientists, investors, and entrepreneurs who made that bet turned science born in Bay State labs into medicines that have changed lives around the world: the first medicines to treat the root cause of cystic fibrosis, the first gene-editing therapy for sickle cell disease, the first new approach to schizophrenia in decades, and the first medicine that silences a disease-causing gene, traced to a Nobel-winning discovery in a University of Massachusetts lab. Today, that bet is happening less and less. And the cost of that timidity will be measured not in dollars but in diseases we choose not to treat.

Our fledgling medical innovation startups are facing myriad headwinds. They begin with the “valley of death,” the inevitable funding gap that kills even promising ideas in their early stages. Then there are federal issues like withering research funding and new grant rules. And Massachusetts remains one of the most expensive places in the country to build a small company, a burden that falls hardest on the youngest ones.

In the early 1990s, doubt that biotech would ever produce a commercially viable medicine almost killed the Massachusetts life sciences ecosystem before it could blossom. Massachusetts proved otherwise. The uncomfortable questions that must be asked: If investors had been this reticent then, would there be a medicine that treats the root cause of cystic fibrosis? Would there be a functional cure for sickle cell disease? And the similarly hard answer: We won’t know what we’re missing if it never arrives.

The déjà vu doesn’t end there. Twenty years ago, US-trained postdocs unable to find jobs here returned to China, seeding the biotech industry now forcing serious conversations about the end of American dominance in biomedical innovation. Today, the risk of losing our best and brightest is just as real. Those in the prime founding years of their careers are migrating out of the Bay State at record numbers, and scientists feel increasingly devalued by Washington.

The state government has stepped in to help before. The Massachusetts Life Sciences Initiative in 2008 helped build the ecosystem we’re now fighting to protect. The need for non-dilutive funding that serves as a bridge for the toughest bets hasn’t gone away. Governor Maura Healey’s Mass Leads Act, signed in 2024, demonstrated the political will to invest. The world has changed considerably since that bill was passed. The Massachusetts Life Sciences Center should aim more of those dollars at companies just leaving university labs.

But the talent is still here. Today’s students and postdocs are hungry to build. The problem is not ambition. It is the support infrastructure that should be meeting it, and it isn’t.

The way forward requires everyone to give a little.

Traditional biotech investors must look earlier and, once again, take on the risk of bold ideas that need time and money to prove their worth. Large pharmaceutical companies must encourage their venture arms to invest earlier in the company-building process and to consider leading those rounds more often. And to the angels and nontraditional investors who haven’t historically seen life sciences as their arena: This is your invitation. The need for patient, mission-driven capital has never been greater.

The incentive for all of the above is concrete: Support early-stage science now and earn a seat at the table as it matures, with first look at the next platform or asset. That is the intelligence advantage investing at arm’s length can never provide, and the opportunity to shape something rather than just fund it.

MassBio and a small number of venture capital groups are already putting capital and credibility behind this conviction. But we can’t do it alone. Massachusetts has an opportunity to make a declaration that the next breakthroughs against pancreatic cancer, ALS, and Alzheimer’s disease will be born here. Not as a celebration, but as a down payment on what comes next.

The question is not whether the next breakthrough is out there. The science exists right now, in labs at our research universities and in the minds of scientific entrepreneurs around the Commonwealth who want to build, not just dream. The question is whether we’ll have the courage to believe in it before they prove it somewhere else.

We’ve done it before. We can do it again.

‘America lost a friend’: Dolly Parton’s impact was widespread

Steering clear of politics, she marked a path to unity

Dolly Parton, who died this week, at 80, was a remarkable person. She was an extraordinary creative musical talent who reached across many genres. She was also a great human being — “You have to accept everything and everybody,” she said. Every time I have watched her perform or listened to her music, I’ve felt a sense of warmth and compassion. She was like a family member or dear friend to all.

She avoided supporting political candidates or parties and strived for unity in our diversity. Political candidates should project the same feelings to all Americans despite whatever differences there may be. However, compassion and understanding of differences must come from the heart.

Mutual respect for others, listening to their perspective, and expressing your understanding are the path to resolving our differences.

Rare accord: Trump and the Democratic Socialists of America send tributes

Who would have thought that Dolly Parton’s passing could bring two political rivals together?

The Democratic Socialists of America and President Trump each offered moving tributes to the country music legend. For once, they found common ground.

If Parton could bring them together, perhaps there’s hope for the rest of us.

Ken Olsen, founder of Digital Equipment, in 1988.

Former employees: RIP, Digital Equipment Corp., and everything you stood for

‘To say it was a privilege to work for Ken Olsen would be an understatement’

Larry Edelman’s recent Trendlines piece on the lost companies of Route 128 struck a nerve deep within me (“A pizza box and ghosts of Route 128: Flashback to 1991 predictions for the minicomputer field,” Business, Aug. 18). I worked for Digital Equipment Corp. for 28 years, including surviving the acquisitions by Compaq and then Hewlett-Packard.

To say it was a privilege to work for DEC (for Ken Olsen) would be an understatement. I couldn’t wait to start my day, often arriving as early as 6 a.m. Many of my closest friendships of today date back to my years at DEC.

At its best, the company was responsible for some of the innovations without which today’s technological environments might not be possible or, at least, might have been delayed. The PDP-1, for example, the first minicomputer that provided real-time interactive computing, goes without saying.

What we now call cloud computing was networked cluster technology beginning in the late 1970s with VAX/VMS. Our current instant messaging may have begun with a “skunkworks” utility called Telephone. And DECnet was one of the earliest networking capabilities. I could list many more.

But as so often happens with wildly successful entrepreneurs, Ken lost his way, suffering hubris. Perhaps the worst was when he doggedly declared, in 1977, “There is no reason for any individual to have a computer in his home.” It was eventually downhill from there.

The coup de grâce was when Robert Palmer was made CEO in 1992 and started breaking up the company and selling the parts. At that point morale went from “It’s a privilege” to “I just want to cry.”

DANIEL S. KLEIN

‘Digital was a great deal more than just a collection of technical innovations’

As a daily Globe subscriber and an employee of Digital Equipment Corp. during the 1980s and ’90s, I read Larry Edelman’s obituary for Massachusetts’ tech startups of that era with great interest.

Digital was a great deal more than just a collection of technical innovations — Ken Olsen’s unique corporate culture of excellence, wherein its employees were its most important asset and primary source of creativity, was itself an innovation. Olsen is rumored to have quipped that he could send everyone home and probably make more money in the short run.

The company’s demise came about when Robert Palmer managed to persuade the board that Digital’s aggregate economic value was less than the sum of its parts and that parts should be sold off piecemeal, ultimately rendering one of the largest Massachusetts employers at the time defunct.

It was around this time that Ronald Reagan’s “trickle down economics” reached its fruition, with a reduction in the income tax rate paid by the highest earners from 70 percent to under 30 percent — a measure that heralded our current era of enormous annual increases in corporate executive compensation. The result has been the obscene exacerbation of the enormous wealth gap in the United States.

One possible solution might be for stockholders to vote to eliminate current corporate executives and boards and replace them with AI agents (if artificial intelligence is indeed that good), and for Congress to restore the marginal tax rate to its pre-Reagan level.

More shark species show up in region’s warming waters

►SHARKS

As ocean temperatures rise, more shark species are slowly migrating northward, pushing deeper into New England waters, finding suitable habitats and an abundance of prey, experts say.

“It’s not that we didn’t see them before. It’s just now that the water temperature is getting into their comfort zone, we’re starting to see them consistently year after year,” said John Chisholm, an adjunct scientist with the New England Aquarium who logs sharks in the region. “It’s becoming expected.”

In recent years, people have spotted juvenile tiger sharks, smooth and scalloped hammerheads, and, most strikingly, blacktip and spinner sharks — two southern species that, until several years ago, had never been documented in Massachusetts waters.

While smooth hammerheads have been sighted near Massachusetts as far back as the late 19th century, they were considered one-offs, “southern strays.” Now they’re arriving in greater numbers, Chisholm said.

And while adult tiger sharks have long been found south of Nantucket and Martha’s Vineyard in offshore submarine canyons, juvenile tiger sharks are now showing up closer to the southern shores of the Cape. Six juveniles have been spotted this summer from Falmouth to Yarmouth, accounting for more than half the sightings since 2002, Chisholm said.

Adult tiger sharks, sometimes referred to as “the garbage can of the sea” because of their indiscriminate diet, are among the largest of the species and second only to white sharks in terms of reported attacks on humans. Juvenile tiger sharks, however, are here for small prey and unlikely to bite people, experts said.

Marine biologists are wary of conflating an uptick in sightings with more sharks throughout local waters. In New England, the growing presence of white sharks has ever more beachgoers on the lookout. Local shark videos fill social media feeds. And researchers are increasingly deploying tools, such as satellite and acoustic tagging, to track them.

Greg Skomal, a senior fisheries biologist with the Massachusetts Division of Marine Fisheries, said the lack of historical and standardized data on sharks in New England makes it difficult to identify trends in their movement and behavior. Still, after nearly 40 years studying sharks in Massachusetts, he’s observed changes.

“We are indeed seeing species that I don’t recall seeing over the course of my career in those earlier decades,” Skomal said. “Something’s changing, and it’s likely associated with an expanding population into new habitat related to warming temperatures.”

Plenty of sharks are commonly found around New England, including blue sharks, basking sharks, makos, and threshers. Others, such as sandbar sharks, the occasional dusky, and sand tiger sharks, are also familiar to researchers.

But the repeated return of sharks typically seen near southern Florida and the Caribbean has intrigued scientists. Blacktip and spinner sharks — “true southern species,” Chisholm said — have never been seen near Massachusetts until a few summers ago.

Slender, fast-moving, known for leaping out of the water and spinning when hunting, black tip and spinner sharks prefer shallow, coastal waters in the mid-70s to 80s in degrees Fahrenheit. Neither are considered dangerous to humans, and most unprovoked attacks resulted in minor wounds.

“They like really warm water, and we’re seeing them now,” Chisholm said.

The Gulf of Maine, which extends from Cape Cod Bay to the southern tip of Nova Scotia, has been warming faster than almost any other stretch of ocean. Since the early 1980s, the rate of surface warming in the gulf has been nearly triple the global ocean average, according to a report from the Gulf of Maine Research Institute.

The waters where smooth hammerheads, juvenile tiger sharks, blacktips, and spinners have been spotted around the Cape and Islands, including Buzzards Bay and Nantucket Sound, have also warmed. While still cooler than southern waters, ocean temperatures here during midsummer have risen about 3.15 degrees Fahrenheit off Woods Hole and about 1.37 degrees off Nantucket since 1998, according to data from temperature monitors.

Several studies indicate sharks throughout the North Atlantic are responding to warming waters. Tiger sharks are migrating into northern latitudes earlier and expanding their movements north, a NOAA Fisheries study found, while blacktip sharks are remaining farther north for longer periods, according to Florida Atlantic University research.

“Sharks are highly migratory species,” said Michelle Passerotti, who leads NOAA’s long-running Apex Predators Program.

CHARLES KRUPA/ASSOCIATED PRESS/FILE/2021

JESSICA RINALDI/GLOBE STAFF

“They are going to move where there is prey and favorable habitat within those thermal tolerances. We’re definitely seeing those habitat ranges shift as water temperatures are changing and oceanographic conditions are changing.”

It’s important to monitor these shifts, she said. Any time a shark species moves beyond its traditional boundaries, it becomes vulnerable to new fishing pressures and environmental stressors.

“That can be detrimental to their population,” Passerotti said.

The warming waters can set off a sort of migration domino effect. As new shark species move into the area, others common to the region start to push north.

For example, the numbers of blue sharks off Rhode Island during the summer have steadily declined over the past couple of decades, said Jon Dodd, executive director of the Rhode Island-based Atlantic Shark Institute. The reason? The water is now too warm for them, he said.

Over the same period, the shark institute has recorded a significant increase in spinners and blacktips, which researchers have found primarily in southern Rhode Island waters and the backside of Long Island.

“It’s clearly water temperature-based because these sharks will find their preferred temperature,” Dodd said.

While on an expedition last month, the organization came across a scalloped hammerhead near Block Island, a far more rare sight in New England than a smooth hammerhead. The researchers also tagged a smooth hammerhead for the first time off Rhode Island and another just days later. Dodd said crews have seen at least 40 hammerheads so far this summer.

Chisholm believes it’s only a matter of time before bull sharks, an apex predator usually found in shallow tropical or subtropical waters — and sometimes fresh water — show up. There have been numerous reports of large bull sharks caught off New Jersey and spotted by drones along Long Island up to Above, a passenger on a Cape Cod shark watch trip filmed a great white shark as it swam past. Left, a jet ski used to scare away sharks passed swimmers at Scarborough Beach in Maine this month.

Montauk. Known for their aggressive behavior, bull sharks are responsible for many unprovoked attacks on humans worldwide.

“They’ll have a big impact,” Chisholm said. “One, bull sharks are one of the top three species that are dangerous to humans. Two, they eat other sharks. They’ll eat blacktip sharks and spinner sharks and sandbar sharks.”

Although other shark species are becoming more visible, great whites off Massachusetts and Maine still generate the most attention. But researchers primarily attribute their resurgence to rebounding seal populations rather than warming waters.

While beachgoers should take appropriate precautions to stay safe in the ocean, Skomal points out it’s exceedingly rare for people to be bitten by any shark.

“There’s no need for general alarm for any of these species,” he said. “Sharks are an incredibly important component of a healthy marine ecosystem. I would argue that we need plenty of sharks in our waters.”

Commuters embrace direct line to Boston on South Coast Rail

has allowed would-be visitors from the north to easily access and explore the rich history, literary traditions, artistic sensibility, and diverse food scene that defines the South Coast.

Daily ridership during the week, which accounts for more than 90 percent of total ridership on the line, averages about 9,500 riders since it launched last year, and has stayed at that level through May, according to the MBTA. It’s 3,000 passengers more than those who took the old Middleborough line, which stopped short of going all the way south to Fall River and New Bedford, in the months before the launch of South Coast Rail.

Sam Storer, 63, who works as a software developer in finance in Boston, finds he’s more productive on the train. He lives in Mattapoisett and boards at Middleborough at around 5.30 a.m., two or three days a week.

“I start working an hour before I get to the office. That’d be dead time to me if I was driving,” said Storer, whose commute takes an hour and 45 minutes. “Nobody likes to commute, but it’s been reliable, consistent, economical, and relatively low stress.”

Some say, however, the MBTA could improve the experience for working commuters. Elise Rapoza, 40, who works as a policy analyst in Boston, spends $12.25 each way plus $4 to park, so $28.50 per day, when she takes the train — typically two or three days a week — into South Station from New Bedford.

She said the MBTA could install Wi-Fi, offer more tables and power outlets, and perhaps get into Boston quicker and more frequently. But those are minor limitations, she said.

“I wouldn’t commute to Boston any other way. Instead of fighting against the traffic, I am sitting comfortably, working. I wish it was faster,” she said.

On the question of Wi-Fi and increased access to power outlets, MBTA spokesperson Lisa Battiston said the MBTA welcomed the feedback, but currently there are no plans to add Wi-Fi to the commuter rail network.

Fall River and New Bedford are both in Zone 8, and a typical monthly pass costs $388, or on a reduced fare — which includes those who are 65 or older, riders with disabilities, or middle and high school students — that comes to $190, Battiston said. If passengers purchase tickets through the MBTA’s mTicket app, they can save $10, or $5 on reduced fares. Through November, the MBTA said these tickets are all discounted by 50 percent.

Since the start of the service, Fall River trains had an on-time performance rate of about 92 percent, while New Bedford trains recorded 91 percent — in lockstep with the commuter network’s overall performance of 91 percent.

Each quarter, schedules are reviewed and revised as officials try to balance the needs of the entire network with available trains and other resources, Battiston said.

As of May, the Fall River/New Bedford commuter line ranked fourth highest in total ridership and fifth highest in average weekday ridership among all the commuter rail lines, according to the MBTA.

Riders say the train has opened up different ways of connecting southern Massachusetts to the rest of the state.

At the Church Street Station in New Bedford on a recent Friday, cars pulled up and dropped off passengers. It was a diverse bunch. Many were taking advantage of the last remaining weeks of the T’s “Free Fridays” offering, which ended Aug. 28. There were young families with children going into the city for the day, retirees taking the train for the first time, plus regular commuters, like Angulo, heading into Boston for work.

Hanna Bordas, 53, a substitute teacher from Dartmouth, stood on the platform with her two children and their two friends. The group was heading to Harvard Square. It’s better than taking the car, which would require her to focus on driving while negotiating her kids’ song requests.

“This is a lot easier,” she said.

“The kids love it. It’s important for them to learn how to use public transport.”

For the region, the rail line also offers a chance to attract workers who earn higher salaries in Greater Boston to settle in cities and towns on the South Coast, where officials say they boost the local economy. In Taunton and Fall River, significant investments in mixed-use development are underway, bolstered by the arrival of the new service.

For some riders, like Michael Senra, the train is a decades-long promise that was finally kept. He grew up in New Bedford and now lives in Pennsylvania, where he teaches at Lafayette College. He remembers driving into Boston as a child with his family at least a couple of times a year but now appreciates the option of taking the train.

“It’s a pretty smooth ride,” Senra said. “Having lived in New Bedford, having public transportation to Boston after the idea of the train being discussed my entire life — it’s nice that it didn’t get lost. Especially for an area of South Coast that at times can feel neglected.”

As the train whisked past farms, rural homes, city parking lots, and the green of forests toward Boston, Michael Haggerty quietly sat next to his bike, checking his phone. The 44-year-old teacher in Rockland boarded the train in Fall River and was heading to Bridgewater. He is a keen cyclist, and over the last two months he has taken advantage of the free rides, getting off at stops along commuter rail routes to explore biking trails in the region.

“It’s been a very rewarding, very relaxing, experience,” he said.

A few seats over, Myrlene Jean-Venant was engaged in an animated conversation with her colleague, Hannah Stohry. Both teach social work at Bridgewater State University. They were heading to the Boston Public Library.

“Free train. Free library. Free AC,” Jean-Venant said, laughing.

One passenger overheard the talk about how the commuter rail had been free on Fridays this summer and was surprised to discover the offer.

“Are you kidding me?” she exclaimed.

The train screeched to a stop at South Station at 10:57 a.m., a minute earlier than scheduled. The passengers disembarked, and were soon enveloped by the bright and hot Boston summer.

While jurors deliberated, a busy scene outside

PLYMOUTH — Coffee shop employees handed out free drinks to passersby. Meanwhile, spectators who have watched the Lindsay Clancy trial unfold milled about outside the courthouse, waiting. A couple carried signs.

Even as jurors began their first full day of deliberations Friday, with no public proceedings taking place, the Clancy trial in Plymouth Superior Court drew widespread attention and activity outside, as the public awaits to hear her fate.

The jury of nine women and three men went home Friday after deliberating for about seven hours, including the 3½ hours that they discussed the case on Thursday after closing arguments. They were set to resume deliberations Monday.

Clancy, 36, is charged in the murders of her three children — Cora, 5, Dawson, 3, and Callan, 8 months — on Jan. 24, 2023, by strangling them in their Duxbury home. She then jumped from a second-story window in an attempt to kill herself and is paralyzed from the waist down.

Clancy has admitted killing her children, but has pleaded not guilty, asserting what is known as an insanity defense. She has argued she was in the throes of a postpartum psychotic episode and should not be held criminally responsible.

Prosecutors allege the killings were premeditated and carried out with extreme atrocity and cruelty by Clancy, who wanted to kill herself because she was tired of her life. She decided to take the children with her because she didn't trust anyone else to care for them.

The question for the jury is whether she should be held criminally responsible. But the case has drawn national attention for the complex questions about postpartum care and mental health that it raises.

Though jurors deliberated behind closed doors, at one point they asked the judge to see Clancy's prescription pill bottles and the knife she used to slit her wrists and neck. They were exhibits in the case but had not been sent to the jury room.

Jurors may review all of the evidence in the case, and the medications and knife were sent back to the jury room upon request. But they weren't initially provided, along with other exhibits, because they are nar-

Cannabis executive discusses stock deal

Perullo takes stand in Tompkins extortion trial

By Danny McDonald

To hear Frank Perullo tell it, he was initially dismissive of Suffolk Sheriff Steven W. Tompkins's request for stock in his cannabis company.

"It wasn't something I thought was possible or we should do," Perullo, a longtime Massachusetts political consultant who once worked as a campaign adviser to Tompkins, told a federal jury on Friday.

But Tompkins persisted, he said, conveying that Perullo's Ascend Wellness Holdings "would not be this big company" without him, underscoring the importance of a partnership between the company and Tompkins's sheriff department that Ascend needed to receive permitting that would allow them to launch their retail operation.

Perullo, who began testifying Friday in Tompkins's extortion trial, said such a push "didn't make me feel great," but he worried that if the plug was pulled on an inmate re-entry program that was tethered to Ascend's local licensing applications, it would mean further delays in getting his retail operation off the ground, possibly slowing the permitting process and complicating the company's progress toward an initial public offering.

"At that point the company needed to open dispensaries," he said.

The asks continued from Tompkins in the vein of "Come on, let me in ... I want to make some cannabis money," recalled Perullo, who hasn't yet been cross-examined by Tompkins's lawyers, who are set to impugn his credibility.

Eventually, Perullo relented, in a deal that is the heart of the ongoing case against Tompkins, a 69-year-old Democrat who for years as sheriff has overseen Nashua Street Jail and South Bay House of Correction in Boston.

"I had never been asked for something that was directly tied to a government action," said Perullo.

Perullo's three hours of testimony came on the fifth day of the extortion trial at the federal courthouse in Boston's Seaport. Perullo, who is well known in local political circles as a lobbyist and campaign adviser, is the star witness for the prosecution in the case; earlier in

Summary of Brown shooting reviews released

PROVIDENCE — External reviews of Brown University's handling of the mass shooting inside a classroom last year found it is "highly unlikely" the Ivy League school could have prevented the tragedy, though it criticized delays in accessing surveillance footage and "notable gaps in leadership" at the campus police department — shortcomings that impeded the investigation.

The university hired Teneo Risk to analyze the school's actions before, during, and after the Dec. 13, 2025 shooting in which two students — Ella Cook and MukhammadAziz Umurzokov — were killed, and nine other people were injured. The gunman, Claudio Manuel Neves Valente, 48, also killed MIT professor Nuno Loureiro at his home in Brookline two days after his attack at Brown. Neves Valente was found dead from a self-inflicted gunshot wound inside a storage unit in New Hampshire on Dec. 18, 2025.

A separate firm, COSECURE, was hired to do a physical assessment of campus facilities.

The university released a summary of the outside reviews on Friday, but refused to release the reports in full. The full reviews "contain sensitive information relating to injuries and fatalities, safety and security ... and personnel matters, and are subject to the attorney-client and work product privilege," the university said.

The university's external reviews are separate from an outside review released earlier Friday by the city of Providence, which flagged communication issues between the city and Brown University but overall praised the city's response to the shooting.

Brown University President Christina H. Paxson declined a request for an interview about the findings. In a message to the campus community, Paxson and Chancellor Brian T. Moynihan wrote Teneo Risk and COSECURE were directed to "independently follow the facts and provide insights and recommendations about Brown's security environment."

"We hope this document will help our community gain a deeper understanding of the events of Dec. 13, areas where Brown was effective in managing the tragedy, and areas where our response and level of preparation can be strengthened for the future," Paxson and Moynihan wrote.

The shooting happened in the Ba-rus and Holley engineering and physics building on campus, in a large lecture hall on a Saturday afternoon while students were in a review session for an economics final. There was only one functioning camera inside Barus and Holley, the report said, and three external cameras. The reviewers did not determine exactly where the suspect entered the building.

Teneo found the university needed to tighten security on campus, noting that the Barus and Holley building was frequently visited by a trespasser named John, who later ended up helping police identify the gunman. While John, whom police said was homeless, was not a threat, his ability to repeatedly access the building "showed areas in which security could have been strengthened," according to a summary of Teneo's review. While the door to the building was unlocked, Teneo found

Cambridge leaders call for release of police video

Judicial inquest into fatal shooting prohibits

By Spencer Buell
GLOBE STAFF

One week after a fatal police shooting of a man in Cambridge, city leaders and at least one member of his family are calling for the release of body-camera footage of the incident — even before a judicial inquest into what happened that night is complete.

The calls come after police fatally shot 64-year-old William Woodworth on a side street in Cambridge's Central Square last Friday night after authorities say he pointed a gun at police.

In a progressive city where the public had clamored for a body-camera program after a fatal police shooting three years ago, believing it would provide more clear-cut answers if another person were to be killed by a police officer, residents are now learning how long it can take to get that transparency even when there were cameras rolling as shots were fired.

"While I believe in the inquest process, I have advocated for quicker release of Body Worn Camera footage before the conclusion of the full process," Yi-An Huang, Cambridge's city manager, said in a statement Thursday. "I believe that the timely release of Body Worn Camera footage is critical to public trust."

The 158th annual Marshfield Fair, which kicked off last week, treats visitors to classic carnival rides, a variety of food, and an eclectic range of entertainers, from jugglers to glass-blowers.

For many, the highlight are the animal shows and 4-H competitions, during which cattle, swine, dogs, goats, rabbits, sheep, poultry, and horses are put on display by young competitors.

“You just couldn’t ask for a nicer end to your summer,” said Jennifer Magaw, of Marshfield, whose two children both showed animals at the fair.

Magaw’s 13-year-old son, Aiden, showed a cow and a bunny last year, which inspired her 11-year-old daughter, Alexandra, to show a goat this year. They are both participants in 4-H, a nationwide youth development organization that encourages kids and teens to learn through hands-on projects like livestock showing.

“For someone as young as Alexandra, it was a lot, and she did a great job. 4-H promotes leadership skills, public speaking skills, taking care of animals, and being responsible. It’s just a great club to be a part of,” Magaw said. “The kids get to show all their skills at the fair, which is amazing.”

At the Marshfield Fair, 4-H participants compete for judges on the physical traits and handling of animals they’re responsible for. Alexandra raised her goat, named Taylor Swift, all by herself at Marshfield-based Farmtastic 4-H Club.

Sarah Maxim’s four kids all participate in show animals and 4-H, and they even founded their own goat club in their hometown of Middleborough. The children are showing goats, rabbits, and a mini-horse in Marshfield this year.

“It’s amazing to see the friends that the kids have made through 4-H experiences, especially the Marshfield Fair,” Maxim said. “It’s pretty heartwarming as a mom to be able to watch our kids grow up in this world with responsibilities and comfort sharing in big ways. It’s not easy to allow someone else to take your animal into a show ring and show them off, so it’s pretty cool to see.”

Maxim’s youngest, 8-year-old

Willow, won two competitions for her goat, Lemonade. Maxim said Willow is “soaking up” her wins, and that the kids are looking forward to enjoying the fair’s other festivities, which end Sunday.

Lauren Kaptimer, of Brockton, went on Wednesday morning with her 7-year-old daughter Salomé when the fair opened early for a sensory-friendly “special morning at the fair.” Kaptimer said she was grateful that her family, who she said are neurodivergent, were able to enjoy the fair in a quiet, less crowded environment.

“I had never been to the Marshfield Fair before, and we had a lovely time,” Kaptimer said. “Those kinds of social situations where there’s so many people often ends up being pretty impossible to enjoy with my kids, because people get overstimulated pretty quickly, but this was fantastic.”

The fair continues from noon to 10 p.m. through Sunday at the Marshfield Fair Grounds, 140 Main St.

Toddler dies after going into deep water at Acton park

By Madyline Swearing
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

A 1-year-old boy died after he went into deep water at Nara Park in Acton Friday while on a walk with his grandmother, who was critically injured trying to save him, and his older siblings who tried to summon help, law enforcement officials said Friday.

The child and grandmother, 75, were found in the lower part of the lake, an area with a depth of 12 to 15 feet that is not designated for swimming, Middlesex District Attorney Marian T. Ryan said at a press conference Friday broadcast by local news stations.

The toddler, who would have turned 2 next week, was flown to a Boston hospital, where he later died from his injuries, Ryan said.

His name was not immediately released.

The grandmother was treated at a local hospital and later transported to a Boston hospital, where she remains in critical condition, according to Ryan.

Shortly after 1:30 p.m., officers responded to a call of two individuals in the lower area of the lake, Ryan said.

The district attorney said it is believed that during a walk, the toddler may have veered in the direction of the water — an area with slippery rocks.

Ryan said the grandmother, the toddler, and two of the toddler’s siblings, were not in bathing suits and did not seem to be at the park for swimming. They were dropped off at the park by the children’s parents.

The toddler’s siblings, a 4-year-old and a 6-year-old, remained on shore and tried to get help, Ryan said.

Two lifeguards and witnesses attempted to help the toddler and grandmother while emergency services responded, she said.

“This is a time to really save a thought for this family for the really unspeakable loss of the child [and] the trauma suffered by the siblings,” Ryan said.

The investigation is ongoing.

No further information was released.

Police say day-care provider accused of abuse turned herself in

By Camilo Fonseca
GLOBE STAFF

A Kingston day-care owner turned herself into authorities Friday after being sought on charges for allegedly abusing toddlers in her care, police said.

Karen Rezendes, 51, faces two felony counts of assault and battery on a child causing injury and three counts of assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, according to court records. She is also charged with seven misdemeanor counts of assault and battery.

Rezendes, who operated Oh Nana’s Daycare out of her Kingston home, pleaded not guilty at her arraignment in Plymouth District Court on Friday, court records show. She was ordered held on $7,500 cash bail.

She is due back in court Sept. 4.

Authorities allege Rezendes acted abusively toward multiple children between 1 and 4 years old. Police said the abuses included shoving a child to the ground, striking a child with kitchen accessories, slamming a child against a counter, and locking a child in the attic.

Investigators interviewed witnesses and also reviewed video depicting the assaults, police said. The state’s Department of Children and Families and Department of Early Education and Care also conducted investigations, which led to the day care losing its license.

Rezendes told parents that she was closing the day care “until further notice” on July 4, citing “a personal matter,” according to court records.

The next day, allegations of abuse were brought to the attention of Kingston police.

Some of the abuse was captured in video footage sent by Rezendes’s husband, Christian Rezendes, who allegedly sent the videos to multiple parents. In one message, he told a parent that he was divorcing his wife.

“This is one [of] the many videos the state received,” Christian Rezendes allegedly said in one message, according to court records.

The videos allegedly show Rezendes yelling at young children, grabbing and pushing them to the ground, causing one child to hit their head on a countertop while roughly placing them in a crib, per court records.

One girl told Kingston police that Rezendes — referred to as “Nana Karen” — had hit her and thrown her in the attic, leading to “bad blood” on her head. She also said Rezendes had hit her in the face with her hand and on her head with a bowl.

“I don’t go to day care anymore because the owner of it is the one who did all the bad stuff,” the girl told police, adding that Rezendes was “awful, I hate her ... not really hate but I can’t be with her.”

A boy told investigators that Rezendes would “pow pow” him on the head and hit him in the face, court records show.

Police said that Rezendes concealed the alleged abuse from parents. In one case she sent a one boy’s parents a photo of an injury to his left eye, telling them he hit his head on a table while picking up a toy.

Police searched Rezendes’s home this week and said they found “corroborating evidence.” They said that Rezendes, who was not home at the time, may have become aware of the search through her home security system.

“Since that time, it appears Rezendes has not returned home,” police said.

Efforts to find her at her home and elsewhere were initially unsuccessful, police said Friday.

Despite “multiple attempts” to locate her, as well as informing her attorney of the arrest warrant, Rezendes remained at large through Friday morning, police said.

“If you know Rezendes, and know where she is, please notify Kingston PD,” police said in a statement. “Do not attempt to detain her.”

She ultimately turned herself in to Plymouth District Court, police said in an update on Friday afternoon.

It was not immediately clear Friday if Rezendes had retained an attorney to represent her.

The investigation remains ongoing. Police encouraged parents to contact authorities if they suspect their children may have been subject to physical abuse at the day care.

“Did your child make allegations of abuse that you first thought were outlandish, or did your child come home with injuries that were alleged to have been from innocent cause but were only witnessed by the defendant?” police said. “They may have been the victims of physical abuse.”

The carving knife was covered with blood and found on a nightstand in the master bedroom on the second floor of Clancy’s Duxbury home after she tried to take her own life.

Meanwhile, as jurors deliberated, spectators, the media, even the lawyers involved, awaited.

Two employees from Marylou’s Coffee handed out free iced coffee from a table in the parking lot of the courthouse.

The coffee shop chain has a small drive-through location across the street from the courthouse. During the trial, water bottles and coffee cups bearing the company’s bubblegum pink labels often rested on stone benches and barriers outside the building.

Employee Jodi Wild, 47, said the coffee shop has seen “a little bit of an uptick” in business since the trial began.

“We’re just over here giving away coffee to the media and everybody inside the courtroom who’s been in here for a month, just putting up with all of this,” Wild said. “Now that the jury’s out, we figured we’d give away some coffee while you guys are sitting and waiting.”

Clancy’s lawyer, Kevin Reddington, drew attention of reporters as he left the courthouse and indicated he was walking to the parking lot, to his car. Then, he simply walked behind a dumpster at the end of the lot and appeared to pace in silence.

“It’s nice out there, you know?” he said to a photographer as he walked back toward the courthouse.

While most of the spectators have arrived in support of Clancy, there have been several who support the prosecution. On a bench facing the courthouse, Christine Fernandes, 48, sat with her 15-year-old daughter Elsie Medeiros, holding up handwritten signs on white printer paper: “1st Degree MURDER” and “KIDSLAUGHTER.”

Fernandes, of Fall River, drove to the courthouse Friday after watching the trial on television during the preceding weeks. She said the case “struck a nerve” with her, as did videos she watched of women wearing pink outside the courthouse in support of Clancy.

“Why pink?” she asked repeatedly, pointing out that green is a color more commonly associated with mental health awareness. She said she was troubled by discussions of women’s mental health during the trial that she said have shifted focus from Clancy’s three children.

“I can understand, yes, women go through more up-and-down emotions than men,” Fernandes said. “Nobody’s denying that. It still doesn’t make it OK for you to kill your kids.”

Separately, Diane and Benjamin Russo, of Wareham, came in support of Clancy, after watching the trial on television.

A former emergency room nurse at South Shore Hospital, Russo, 54, said she experienced postpartum depression after the births of her daughters, who are now in their 20s.

“When I would go to work, I literally went the long way to avoid the birthing unit, because just seeing it gave me anxiety,” she said.

She said she disliked how prosecutors spoke about postpartum mood disorders during the trial.

“I don’t think they’re recognizing that it’s a real thing,” she said.

She planned to return to the courthouse Monday.

Officials confirm first human case of West Nile virus reported in Boston

By Madyline Swearing
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

A man in his 60s is the first person to test positive for West Nile virus in Boston, and the third human case in Massachusetts this year, public health officials said Thursday.

The state Department of Public Health said the risk of contracting the mosquito-borne virus is “high” in Boston.

The Department of Public Health announced the state’s first human case of the virus last week, when a man in his 90s contracted the virus in Middlesex County. On Monday, officials announced the state’s second human case — a man in his 60s who was also exposed in Middlesex County.

No further information was released about when or where the men were exposed.

“West Nile Virus can result in very serious illness and may pose serious danger to older and more vulnerable members of our communities,” Boston Public Health Commissioner Dr. Bisola Ojikutu said in a statement.

The commission will monitor the situation with the state Department of Public Health, the statement said.

West Nile virus is spread to humans through the bite of an infected mosquito, according to the state Bureau of Infectious Disease and Laboratory Sciences.

The virus can cause illnesses ranging from mild fever, to encephalitis or meningitis, and may potentially be fatal, according to public health officials. People older than 50, and those who are immunocompromised are at higher risk of developing severe illness, officials said.

Officer cited for alleged negligent operation in Brockton car crash

A state trooper is facing a criminal charge for allegedly causing a car crash in August that injured two other people, officials said.

Robert Ladue has been cited with negligent operation of a motor vehicle, a misdemeanor with a maximum sentence of two years in a house of correction, officials said.

Ladue has also been cited for speeding, a civil infraction, according to Bristol County District Attorney Thomas M. Quinn III’s office, which is prosecuting the case.

WCVB-TV previously reported on the new development in the investigation.

Ladue was on duty shortly before 11 p.m. on Aug. 11 when he collided with another vehicle on Belmont Street in Brockton.

Ladue and two people in the other vehicle were injured.

Officials said Thursday they had no information on the medical status of the two other people.

“The Massachusetts State Police remain committed to supporting the Bristol County District Attorney’s Office’s investigation into the facts and circumstances of this crash,” a State Police spokesperson said in a statement. “We wish all who were injured a swift and full recovery.”

The case is pending in Brockton District Court, prosecutors said. A spokesperson for Quinn said she had no other information about the investigation.

Ladue is on medical leave as he recovers from his injuries.

the week, a prosecutor had implored the jury during opening statements to listen to his testimony “carefully.”

Prosecutors allege Tompkins used his position as sheriff to extort Ascend, the cannabis company Perullo co-founded, twice — once for early access to purchase $50,000 worth of stock in the company and later to get his money back after the stock value tanked.

Tompkins had not signed any agreement that would have guaranteed a refund on his initial investment, according to the indictment, but Perullo paid him back anyway.

While applying for a necessary license, Ascend needed to show how the business would have a “positive impact,” especially on communities adversely affected by the nation’s war on drugs, according to the indictment in the case. For Ascend, that requirement was allegedly met through its partnership with Tompkins on a program to train and hire people recently released from jail, prosecutors have said.

This partnership allegedly gave Tompkins leverage; without it, according to prosecutors, company officials feared they would not have their license renewed to operate a shop downtown.

But earlier this week, Tompkins defense attorney Martin G. Weinberg portrayed Perullo as having “negotiated a cynical exchange” with federal authorities to avoid prosecution. The prosecution’s case was hinging on Perullo’s testimony, which Weinberg labeled “uncorroborated.”

“He had everything at stake,” Weinberg said of Perullo.

Friday found Perullo, a bespectacled and suited presence on the stand, testifying mere feet away from Tompkins, a man whom he once counted as a friend.

Tompkins, he said, was happy when Perullo agreed to let him have a slice of a holding company that held Ascend shares.

“I think he said, ‘That’s great, where do I send the money?’ Something like that,” said Perullo.

The Globe reported last year that Perullo has operated behind the scenes in Democratic politics for decades, first as a 20-year-old in the secretary of state’s office and parlaying that experience into a political consulting firm that pioneered the use of voter data to redefine campaigns.

But Friday from the witness stand, Perullo, now 50 and living in Lexington, filled in other parts of his biography. He acknowledged that he was a marijuana dealer as a young man, back when the drug was very much illegal in Massachusetts. A carjacking in Chelsea changed the course of his life, he said.

After Massachusetts voters legalized marijuana in 2016, Perullo leveraged his connections around state politics to make his company, Novus Group, what he claimed was “one of the nation’s leading cannabis consulting firms.”

He told the Globe Spotlight Team in 2019 that he had tapped his network and used his know-how to guide 40 to 50 proposed pot shops through the state’s regulatory scheme. But Perullo did more than act as a consultant: He made the jump to marijuana executive, co-founding Ascend.

Perullo featured prominently in the Spotlight Team’s 2019 series “The hidden titans of pot”½ which found that large national companies were dominating the Massachusetts market by skirting regulations intended to limit them to a maximum of three stores in the state. The series described Perullo as one of the state’s most influential power-brokers in the nascent pot industry who helped companies pursue licenses in apparent excess of the ownership caps.

Perullo also helped recruit former political clients to work in the business. They included Tompkins’s predecessor and close friend, former Suffolk County sheriff Andrea Cabral, whom Perullo enlisted to serve as chief executive of Ascend Massachusetts. Cabral, who is also expected to testify in the Tompkins trial, is no longer with the company.

On Friday, the prosecution dove into the nitty gritty of Ascend’s licensing process and combed through internal emails and the company’s code of conduct.

Perullo recalled drafting an agreement outlining the stock deal with Tompkins himself. He did not want an attorney involved in the creation of that document. When federal prosecutor Dustin Chao pressed him as to why, Perullo replied, “I didn’t think it was right.”

Summary of Brown shooting reviews released stronger security may not have prevented a shooting, as the gunman could have targeted another building or people outside.

After the shooting, the university implemented keypad access for the external doors of almost all buildings on campus, though administrators have not yet decided whether that change will be permanent.

Teneo found that the hunt for the shooting suspect “was slowed by delays in accessing Brown’s repository of stored video images” and by the limited number of cameras at Barus and Holley. Campus police “faced challenges in locating personnel authorized to access the video,” the reviewers found.

“These delays impeded the [Providence Police Department’s] ability to conduct its immediate post-incident investigation,” Teneo’s reviewers wrote.

In its response to the reviews, the university said it has added 700 cameras on campus since the shooting, bringing the total number to more than 1,900. A community safety survey conducted this past spring found a majority of students and faculty wanted more cameras, the university said. The university also said it would strengthen its policy for using its emergency siren, which was not used during the shooting.

The outside reviewers found fault with the then-leaders of the campus police department, writing there were “notable gaps in leadership” that impeded the investigation. The reviewers said former senior leaders — whom they didn’t name — “failed to provide vital assistance to the unified command at the crime scene” and did not adequately prepare officers for an active shooter incident. Those shortcomings didn’t ultimately cause any harm on campus in this case, the reviewers wrote, since the gunman left so quickly after the shooting.

“Stronger leadership by the individuals in question might have improved the investigative process,” the report states.

Brown has a fully armed police force, formally known as the Department of Public Safety and Emergency Management, staffed by sworn officers who are often retired from local police departments. Rodney Chatman, who was campus police chief at the time of the shooting, was removed from his position after the shooting and replaced by Colonel Hugh Clements, the former chief of the Providence Police Department. Clements got the job permanently in April, after Brown reached an undisclosed settlement with Chatman.

Chatman’s tenure as chief was marred with controversy: He received votes of no confidence from multiple unions representing public safety employees, and was the target of a blistering 2025 editorial from the student newspaper, The Brown Daily Herald.

Chatman could not immediately be reached for comment Friday.

Mayor Brett Smiley said he was more confident in Brown’s police department under Clements, noting that Clements is closely collaborating with his former colleagues at the Providence Police Department.

Smiley said he is calling on Brown to join the city’s real-time crime center, a hub at the police department where detectives can see video from a variety of city-owned and private cameras all in one place. The owners of the private cameras, such as those at Brown University, can opt in to the crime center so police can access footage from their surveillance systems during an emergency.

“I know that would have helped in this incident, and I believe it will help in future public safety incidents,” Smiley said.

Brown spokesperson Brian Clark says the university is willing to join the system, but only if it can control when police can access the university’s cameras. He said Brown would work on an agreement with Providence police this fall. The ACLU has urged Brown and other local universities not to give police access to their cameras, citing privacy concerns.

Brown is also considering equipping its police officers with body cameras, and plans to complete an assessment by May 2027, the university wrote in its action plan moving forward.

Both the Providence and Brown reviews released Friday flagged communication issues that slowed the Providence Police Department’s investigation after the shooting. The city’s external report said Brown officials initially told Providence police their campus buses were not equipped with cameras, which turned out to be incorrect.

Video from a university shuttle bus was later recovered, and showed the suspect fleeing campus after the shooting.

Months after the shooting, the FBI concluded the gunman, who attended Brown 25 years ago, appeared to be fueled by personal grievances and resentments tied to his own personal failures. He acted alone, investigators concluded.

While the criminal investigation is over, the US Department of Education is still conducting a Clery Act investigation into the university’s security procedures. The Clery Act is a consumer protection law requiring colleges and universities to produce annual security reports detailing crime statistics on campus, along with their safety and security procedures.

Gang member sentenced for role in shooting at nightclub

By Tonya Alanez
GLOBE STAFF

A member of the violent Trinitarios gang in Lynn has been sentenced to more than 11 years in federal prison for racketeering and his involvement in two murders and three attempted murders, according to the office of Leah B. Foley, US Attorney for Massachusetts.

Luis Enrique Santana, known as “Chiquito,” pleaded guilty to RICO charges in April and was sentenced Aug. 19 in federal court in Boston, prosecutors said in a statement Tuesday.

The 32-year-old was sentenced to 136 months in prison, to be followed by three years of supervised release. He will be deported to the Dominican Republic after his release from prison, federal prosecutors said.

In February 2025, 22 reputed members and associates of the transnational gang were charged in a litany of crimes, including six murders in Lynn and Lawrence, the Globe reported.

Gang members wreaked havoc on communities across the state for more than a decade and “were responsible for years of bloodshed,” Foley said when announcing the charges.

In June, 26 additional gang leaders, members, and associates of the Lawrence, Haverhill, and Boston chapters of the gang were charged with RICO and drug charges.

The Trinitarios have been federally charged in 11 murders; five of the killings have occurred since 2017, Foley’s office said.

Two members, including the leader of the Lynn chapter, have been sentenced. Seven others have pleaded guilty and await sentencing, prosecutors said.

Santana was a gang member and a rapper who published music videos glorifying the Massachusetts Trinitarios. The videos featured Santana and others with guns making threats to rival gangs, according to Foley’s office.

Prosecutors say that in March 2019 Santana posed online as a female to lure three rival gang members to a Lynn nightclub.

Chapter leader Aaron Diaz Liranzo went to the club and shot and wounded two of the men. He was sentenced to 14 years in prison for the attempted murders, Foley’s office said.

Santana also participated in the aftermath of the murders of two other rivals, Jandriel Heredia and Abraham Diaz, prosecutors said. After a drive-by shooting at a college send-off party on Sept. 2, 2023, in Lynn, Santana concealed the vehicle used in the shooting by moving it to Lawrence and destroying evidence inside it.

In Cambridge, calls for release of shooting footage

Potentially gruesome body-camera footage may be difficult to watch, and does not always capture every crucial moment of tense police interactions, particularly ones that unfold at close range.

But letting the public see what transpired may be valuable, said Leslie Woodworth, who is one of the victim’s sisters.

“Let’s be as transparent as we can all be. Sure, release the footage. People want to know,” Woodworth, who lives in Texas, said in an interview.

Woodworth said she had also not been shown any body-camera footage of the incident yet and stressed that she is not speaking for his entire family.

“I want this to move along as fast as possible,” she said. “I can barely work. I can’t think. I can’t focus. This sucks. Get this over with.”

Authorities have said an investigation into her brother’s death involves a review of video recorded by body cameras worn by officers who were there the night of the fatal police shooting.

But the district attorney’s office said it has requested a judicial inquest into whether the shooting was justified, and that a judge assigned to the case issued a protective order barring the city from releasing any videos related to it until that process is over.

“This office follows judicial orders in all cases at all times,” the office said in a statement.

Some officials in Cambridge are already getting impatient amid fears that processes like these can drag on for months, and that residents will be left in the meantime to rely on the word of police alone.

“There is a public interest here,” said Sumbul Siddiqui, a city councilor and the city’s mayor, who is also calling for the release of the footage. “These are hard issues, and I get that, but I think we’re undermining the whole effort around greater transparency.”

Cambridge’s body-camera program launched just last year, after the 2023 fatal police shooting of college student Sayed Faisal led to outrage and protests, and prompted the city to invest in the devices. Many in the city believe the turmoil was fueled by a lack of footage of the moments leading up to Faisal’s death, which left unanswered questions about how police might have responded differently. A nine-month-long inquest in that case found the police shooting was justified.

Now some who backed the body-camera program are trying to avoid a repeat.

“The inquest can take a while, and I think if you don’t provide people with information, that void just gets filled with speculation and rumors,” said Marc McGovern, also a city councilor. “I don’t think that’s a healthy way to go.”

He said there is a balance to be struck between the desire for a thorough investigation and for quick resolution, but the public release of that footage doesn’t have to be at odds with that goal. Body-camera footage has also been controversial in Boston, where an advocacy group has filed a lawsuit seeking the release of video evidence in a manslaughter case against a city police officer.

“Few governmental records implicate a greater public interest than body-worn camera footage documenting the fatal use of force by law enforcement officers,” Victoria S. Miranda, an attorney for Lawyers for Civil Rights, wrote in the suit.

The fact that footage exists of a high-profile Cambridge police incident and isn’t being shared also feels out of step with how quickly information — and footage of police activity in particular — travels these days, and how readily available it often is online, said Councilor Burhan Azeem.

“The internet has made it so that things move a lot faster, and everyone has cameras,” Azeem said. “The idea that you should wait months or years to understand what happened does not match the moment.”

For his part, Tim Flaherty, also a city councilor, said that he felt the footage “should be released immediately,” and that he didn’t believe there needed to be an inquest at all because there was already enough evidence the police acted appropriately given the circumstances.

Some city councilors have said they believe that footage of the incident should not be shown to the officers who were at the scene during the shooting so they can’t tailor their recollection of what happened to what is viewable on tape. But, they said, that shouldn’t delay release indefinitely.

“It’s my understanding those interviews have now taken place,” said Councilor Jivan Sobrinho-Wheeler. “The whole argument for having body cameras was to be able to answer critical questions in the aftermath of an incident like this — not months later.”

Still, not every official in Cambridge feels the same way: The city’s top police leader underscored what was beyond her control.

“We understand the public’s interest in this incident and share the City Manager’s desire for the timely release of Body Worn Camera footage,” acting police commissioner Pauline Wells said in a statement. “At this time, however, decisions regarding the release of evidence are outside the Department’s authority.”

Lowell kids saddle up for horse rides, flag football with officers, volunteers

By Breanne Kovatch
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Kids in Lowell were horsing around with police officers this summer at a farm in Tewksbury. They learned flag football skills and drills from volunteers at the high school football stadium.

The summer fun was part of Lowell Police Youth Services, which uses state funding and other financial resources to create new opportunities for at-risk youth.

In July, 46 pre-teens and teens saddled up alongside police officers at Strongwater Farm Therapeutic Equestrian Center in Tewksbury for a special horse riding program.

The goal was to help kids build self-confidence, learn something new, and get some fresh, healthy outdoor adventure, police said in a statement.

“I look forward to the riding program every summer because I have experienced the way the horses bring people together by demanding focus, calm, and care,” Lowell Police Superintendent Greg Hudon said in a statement.

The kids were split into six groups for a one-week session of the program, which was offered from July 13 to July 31.

Alongside police officers, youths learned to care for the horses, working their way up to leading and riding them.

“What stood out most this year were the conversations — honest, emotional, and full of empathy among the participants,” Starlet Baker, executive director of Strongwater Farm said in the statement.

The program, offered for a third year, is one of several offered by Lowell Police Youth Services, which aim to build bonds between kids and officers.

This month, for example, 75 boys and girls in middle and high school took part in a three-day flag football camp at Cawley Memorial Stadium.

Police and department staff volunteered for the camp. At the end, All People Church of Lowell put on a BBQ, complete with ice cream sandwiches. Police also partnered with Wellpoint, a health insurance company, to provide 300 new backpacks to families who lined up in the stadium parking lot.

In the fall, a one-month flag football challenge will be held for students in grades 5 to 8, the statement said.

The youth services program receives funding from the state’s Shannon Community Safety Initiative, “which seeks to support at-risk youth across the Commonwealth,” according to the statement.

Strongwater Farm also used funds from the Crotty Foundation to help support the horse riding program, police said.

“Programs like those offered by the Lowell Shannon partners,” said Kevin Stanton, executive director of the state Office of Grants and Research, which administers Shannon funds, “are key to building community trust and ensuring the safety and well-being of our youth.”

Edwidge Danticat’s fifth novel, “Dèy,” opens with random violence. We meet Danticat’s protagonist, Magnolia, at Hibiscus Mall, a fictional space in a real setting, Miami. She’s there to buy her daughter, Zôe, a cellular phone for her upcoming 10th birthday. Instead of the mall’s phone store, Magnolia finds herself in a restaurant, Oasis, sheltering in place with others as an active shooter roams the complex. “Remember,” the Oasis’s proprietor whisper-hisses to her cowering clientele, “run, hide, fight.”

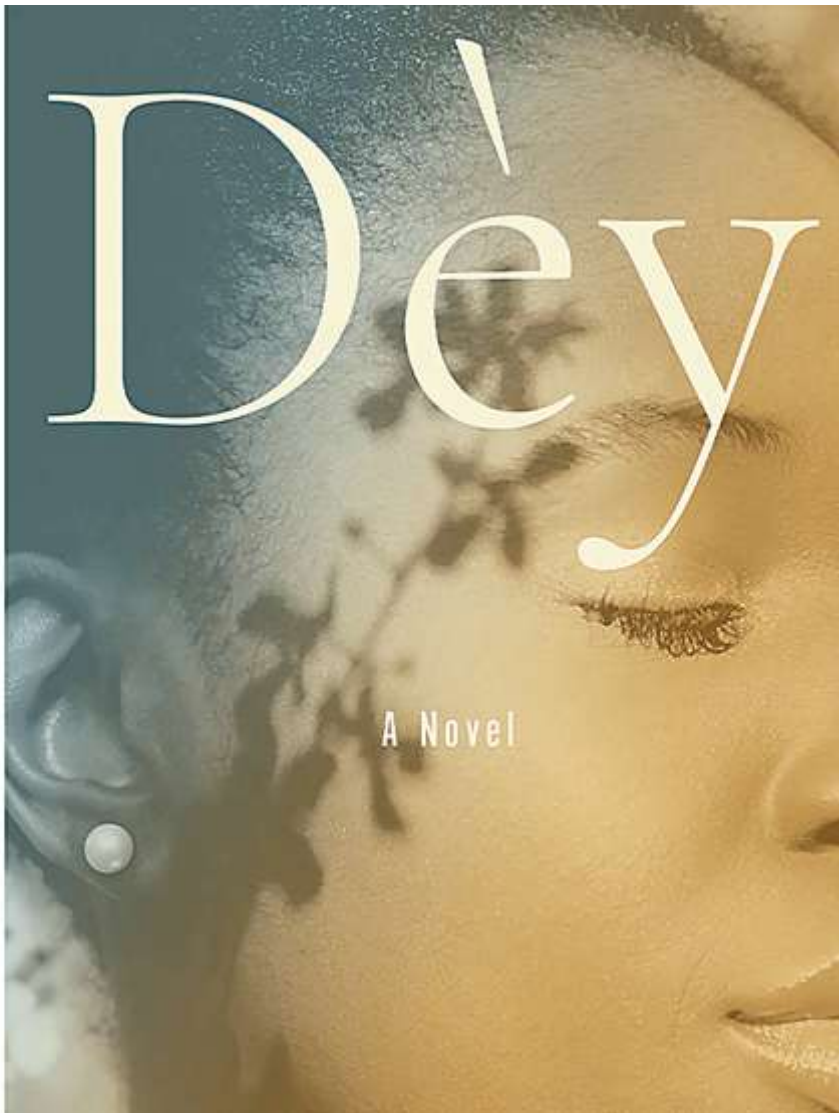

Though the police arrive quickly, take out the shooter, and lead survivors into the building’s parking lot, Magnolia arrives there in a state of trauma-induced disorientation. Noticing that the stormwater pond is filled with tiny, “sparkly, flickering,” bioluminescent fish, she worries that she is “anba dlo, under the sea?” “Are we simply to walk away,” she wonders. Barefoot, having lost her sandals in the upheaval, Magnolia runs for her car, weaving across the grassy areas between the other vehicles, and doesn’t look back.

Though dazed following her escape, Mag (as her friends and Harrison, her estranged partner, call her) or Ma (as her parents and half-brother call her) races home, showers, changes clothes, and returns to her workday as a real estate agent. When she opens her phone to strings of text and voice messages, her instinct is to reassure and calm others rather than burdening anyone with the harrowing details of her confrontation with death. “Did you hear what happened at the mall?” another agent asks when they meet at a property Ma is selling for a client. “It’s crazy that you have to watch yourself everywhere you go these days. I don’t go to movies anymore, and after today, I’m giving up malls. I’m ordering online. I mean, my God, the same things people are leaving other countries for are happening to them here.”

Meanwhile, in Croix-des-Bouquets, Haiti, Ma’s family struggles to keep their home safe from the San Manman, the Motherless, an armed gang operating in and around Port-au-Prince doing “daytime and midnight raids, torching homes, sometimes with entire families still inside. They moved on to mass kidnappings, snatching busloads of passengers and threatening execution if ransoms weren’t paid. ... [They sprayed] bullets into houses ... killing people in their sleep.”

The evening after the shooting, media outlets report that “the shooter was a twenty-one-year-old white male, a Floridian” who’d grown up with “Caribbean immigrants and African American neighbors in Broward County.” His manifesto spouted the familiar tropes: “They will breed us out of existence.” “Our country is under attack.” “They are poisoning the blood.” Turning to the international news on cable, Ma links the attack in the mall and the banditry in Haiti to a violent global matrix: “In Afghanistan, the Islamic State escalated bombings against the Shia population. In Yemen, opposition fighters seized government buildings. Israeli forces raided homes near Ramallah and Nablus. There were anti-government protests in Venezuela, Iran, and the Democratic Republic of Congo; bomb attacks in Colombia, Nigeria, and Pakistan; air strikes in Syria; mass shootings in Mexico, Brazil, and then suddenly at the Hibiscus Mall in Miami, Florida, where one of the initial survivors, the seventeen-year-old boy, [Jaden ‘Duke’ Kingsley], ‘tragically succumbed overnight to bullet wounds to the head.’” inversion: the novel’s social sweep and focal intensity on the protagonist’s emotional and psychological undulations paired with the short story’s compressed clock. It’s also a continuation of the concerns, themes, symbols, and predilections that Danticat’s wrestled with in titles such as “The Farming of Bones” (1998), “Brother, I’m Dying” (2007), “Create Dangerously: The Immigrant Artist at Work” (2010), and “The Art of Death: Writing the Final Story” (2017).

Arranged in four movements — “Run,” “Hide,” “F(1)ight,” “Dèy” (“mourning” in Haitian Kreyòl) — the novel is a defense strategy and living elegy. As the novel closes, the other characters from Miami, Haiti, and Brooklyn encircling her in birthday celebration, Ma recalls that hours after the shooting she felt ghostly, as though she’d died but her mind couldn’t accept it: “I had left so much unresolved my spirit was haunting those I love. Had I really walked out of the mall, driven away? Every now and then, this feeling would return, but I refused to acknowledge it. Even my parents’ visit seemed suspect. ... Had they all come not just for my birthday but for my dèy?”

Ma must learn to bear witness to the shooting and its aftermath. Her deathly experience is ours, too. I feel this overlap keenly reading this novel while US state and federal officials humiliate Haitian immigrants — “guilty” of seeking refuge from their failing nation-state and access to stable economic possibilities — forcing them, as though hardened criminals or wild beasts, to wear GPS-tracking ankle bracelets. As one Haitian aphorism about death puts it: “Li devan. Nou deyè. He went ahead. We’re right behind.”

Celine Dion is back in Paris, but first song remains ‘a big secret’

By John Leicester

PARIS — Celine Dion blew kisses and made a love-heart shape with her hands as she swept into Paris on Friday for her first series of concerts since revealing her diagnosis with stiff-person syndrome. Fans yelling “We’re so happy to see you” and “We love you” crowded with journalists outside a Paris hotel as the Grammy-winning star settled in to prepare her residency of 16 shows in September and October at the Plénitude Arena in the French capital’s western suburbs. The first show opens on Sept. 12. “I am ready and I’m a bit uptight of course because it’s been a long time,” she told French broadcaster BFMTV, wearing a beige trench coat, high heels, and dark shades. “I have always felt supported from the first day and because it’s a story that continues. It’s true that this is my second home,” the Quebec-born singer said. Asked which song she’d sing first, Dion replied: “I can’t say, it’s a big secret!” The Paris concerts, to be followed by 10 more next May, mark a major milestone for 58-year-old Dion after years away from touring due to the rare neurological disorder she disclosed in 2022. With nearly 260 million albums sold worldwide, Dion remains one of the best-selling and most decorated artists in pop music history, known for hits including “My Heart Will Go On” and “Because You Loved Me.” The concert series, titled “Celine Dion Paris 2026-2027,” will feature her catalog of hits in English and French. Dion has largely stepped back from performing since canceling her Courage World Tour as her condition progressed. She wowed with a brief but widely watched return at the opening ceremony of the Paris Olympics in 2024, singing “Hymne à l’amour” (Hymn to love) atop the Eiffel Tower in the rain. The Plénitude Arena has a capacity of 40,000 spectators and was one of the venues used for the Paris Games.

Bill Burr and Anthony Michael Hall talk bar pizza, Cape cuisine, and Mass. roots in podcast chat

Anthony Michael Hall got to chat with “fellow Mass. guy” Bill Burr on Thursday’s edition of the comedian’s “Monday Morning Podcast.” Hall, a former “Saturday Night Live” cast member and actor known for his roles in John Hughes hits like “Sixteen Candles” and “The Breakfast Club,” sat for a wide-ranging discussion with Burr, which of course included vibing over their mutual Massachusetts roots. Burr revealed that, for a long time, he didn’t know Hall was a fellow Bay State native since he “didn’t have the accent,” with Hall noting that he’s originally from West Roxbury, but was born in Dedham. “My mother’s whole family is from there,” Hall told Burr during the podcast, with the comic exclaiming that he grew up in nearby Canton and that his late friend, comedian Patrice O’Neal, was also from West Roxbury. Hall went on to explain that he left Massachusetts at an early age, with his mother taking him out to California in the early ’70s as she pursued her dreams as a singer. “It was kind of like that old movie, ‘Alice Doesn’t Live Here Anymore,’” Hall said. “She was a single mom, drove across the country with me.” Toward the end of the conversation, Burr asked Hall if he has visited Massachusetts since moving away, with the actor noting that he “was just on the Cape about a month ago,” and comes back often since he has many relatives still in the area. “I go back and see ... my mother’s family, and all my cousins,” Hall said. Burr then chatted with Hall about the Bay State’s famous bar pizzas, with the comedian admitting that he’s “obsessed” with them. “I’ve gone all the way up to Marblehead, I’ve gone everywhere,” Burr said, noting that he keeps a list of all the good spots. “I can go down Route 3, I can go down 95, 93, whatever you want. ... Not so good out the 405, so if anybody has some suggestions.” Burr added that he’s even explored Facebook groups dedicated to bar pizza during his search. “The South Shore is more inviting, where you can just join the group,” Burr said. “But the North Shore, I felt you had to jump through a few hoops. I’m like, ‘All right, they’re a little more guarded. What, is their pizza a little better?’” While Hall didn’t offer up any bar pizza suggestions, he did reveal that he’s a fan of the region’s lobster rolls and enjoyed solid seafood while on a recent visit to Hyannis. “Always good fish, man,” Hall said. “You can always trust the fish on the Cape.”

Gasper embodies never-say-die Red Sox

When Mickey Gasper was sent back to Triple-A Worcester on June 28, I figured it might be the last time we saw him as a Red Sox big leaguer. He had struggled at the plate before the demotion, going 7 for 49 (.143 average) in his previous 15 games, with just two runs batted in and a puny .184 slugging percentage. His defense behind the plate wasn't exactly reminiscent of 1990 Tony Peña, and at 30 years old . . . well, unestablished players looking back on their 30th birthday who let a chance slip can't always count on another coming their way. Instead, he got another chance — earned it, I should say, with professionalism and production in Triple-A. Gasper has hit .337 with a 1.016 OPS in 196 at-bats for the WooSox this season. So when Masataka Yoshida suffered a hamstring injury a few weeks ago, the switch-hitter was a logical replacement to come up and try to fill a specific role as the lefty-hitting designated hitter. Thank goodness another opportunity found him.

Gasper has been so essential, so exceptional, since his return that he has come to embody this wild, winning Red Sox team — one that seems to be better the more presumed replacement-level players it has in the lineup. Gasper — who we should note was productive early in the season even when the Sox were lousy, hitting .328 with a .789 OPS in 19 games from May 10 through June 3 — has been a wrecking ball in the small but important sample size since his return. In nine games and 33 plate appearances through Thursday, he's slashed .417/.576/1.167 with five home runs, 12 RBIs, and seven walks against just one strikeout. That includes a stretch from Aug. 17-19

First rivalry game sees Sandoval pitching at his best

NEW YORK — Friday night's start against the Yankees was the biggest test of the season for Red Sox starter Patrick Sandoval, an evaluation of his worthiness to pitch even bigger games down the road. The lefthander passed, although his team failed. Dropped into the cauldron of a Red Sox-Yankees game for the first time, Sandoval allowed one run on three hits over 5½ innings with four walks and seven strikeouts. The walks aside, that's a performance the Sox would take every time. "He was outstanding," interim manager Chad Tracy said. But the run Sandoval gave up — on a home run by Paul Goldschmidt in the third inning — was all

Yankees 1 Red Sox 0 NEW YORK — In the most important series of their season — so far — the Red Sox have more on the line at Yankee Stadium than four games in three days. And they know it. They lost the opener against the Yankees on Friday night, an awfully eventful 1-0 game highlighted by Walpole native Cam Schlittler's 5½ scoreless innings and lowlighted by what Cedanne Rafaela called his two "dumb decisions" on the bases — a playoffs-lite atmosphere with play-offs-esque managerial moves and bubbling post-season implications. With a month to go, the Yankees (76-58) hold the first wild-card berth in the American League. The Red Sox (73-61) are second, trailing their rivals by three games. Those two seeds meet in the best-of-three Wild Card Series — hosted exclusively by the team with the better record. Like last year, the Sox would end up in New York. Yin grabs spotlight away from Korda

By Emma Healy

NORTON — A crowd of at least 100 people followed Group 7 from start to finish Friday morning at TPC Boston, jockeying for space at the ropes on every hole. The herd moved in lock step for 4½ hours during the second round of the FM Championship, growing larger as the group approached the 18th green. Many were there to follow Nelly Korda, the world's No. 1 player, in the group. But while Korda looked out of sorts, finishing even for the second day in a row and making the cut by a hair, Ruoning Yin gave the crowd plenty to cheer about. Yin finished Round 2 with a 7-under-par 65 to vault into a tie for fourth at 8 under overall. She sits one stroke back from leaders Allisen Corpuz, Hyo Joo Kim, and Miyu Yamashita heading into the weekend. "I would love [for] people to come watch me, but I think 99 percent is probably for Nelly," Yin said with a chuckle. "But the crowd is amazing this week. We teed off early today, but still there is a big amount of people [who came] out to watch. It just feels great." With hundreds of eyes on her — more, she said, than she would expect on a Friday — Yin carded eight birdies to rebound from her middle-of-the-road performance Thursday (1-under 71). "Yesterday I think I didn't do anything wrong, but the score just wasn't good," Yin said. As a nice added bonus, with Friday's performance, Yin won a friendly wager with her coach. He told her Thursday that he was going to leave early, unless she finished Friday's round 7 under. Looks like he's staying for the weekend. "I know my game is in the right spot," Yin said. "I think

Projecting Patriots' final 53-man roster

By Nicole Yang

CLEVELAND — After five weeks of practices and three pre-season games, let's review our final projection for the Patriots' 53-man roster. Cutdown is Sunday at 6 p.m. The roster could still have changes before the Sept. 9 opener at Seattle following waiver claims. Quarterbacks (3) In: Drake Maye, Tommy DeVito, Behren Morton There's a chance the Patriots try to slip Morton through waivers, but it feels as though he's earned a spot. Morton, a seventh-round pick, has comported himself well through the three preseason games, even showing off his special teams versatility. Running backs (3); fullback (1) In: Rhamondre Stevenson, TreVeyon Henderson, Hassan Haskins, Reggie Gilliam Out: Lan Larison, JaMycal Hasty, Jam Miller

►Despite injuries, the special teams got the job done. C2 ►Raiders mum on QB1. C2 The third running back competition still feels like a toss-up. Larison, who boasts pass-catching and kick-returning ability, hasn't been able to run away with his opportunities. It wouldn't be surprising if the Patriots give Haskins the edge, for his experience and special teams value. Wide receivers (6) In: A.J. Brown, Romeo Doubs, Mack Hollins, DeMario Douglas, Kyle Williams, Efton Chism Out: Nick DeGennaro, Kyle Dixon, Cameron Dorner, Tejhaun Palmer The Patriots solved their wide receiver logjam by trading Kayshon Boutte to the Texans. If there's a player that could still be on the outs, it's Chism. But he's shown to be a viable backup option out of the slot and could expand his role on special teams. The Patriots look poised to carry six wide receivers to start the season.

Tight ends (3)

In: Hunter Henry, Eli Raridon, Tanner Arkin
Out: CJ Dippre, Jack Westover

Injured reserve: Julian Hill
Not much has changed on this depth chart since the beginning of training camp. Henry, the reliable veteran leader, and Raridon, the up-and-coming rookie, are roster lockers. Arkin, who popped early in camp for his tough-nosed blocking and physicality, seems to be the best option to fill the role of the injured Hill.

Offensive linemen (10)

In: Will Campbell, Alijah Vera-Tucker, Jared Wilson, Mike Onwenu, Morgan Moses, Caleb Lomu, Marcus Bryant, Ben Brown, Greg Van Roten, Dametrious Crownover

Out: Mehki Butler, Darrian Dalcourt, James Hudson, Lorenz Metz, Joe Michalski, JonDarius Morgan, Jacob Rizy

In: Milton Williams, Christian Barmore, Cory Durden, Leonard Taylor, Eric Gregory, Joshua Farmer, Dre'Mont Jones, Harold Landry, Gabe Jacas, Elijah Ponder

Out: Bradyn Swinson, Amari Gainer, Xavier Holmes, Quintavious Hutchins, Isaiah Iton, Jesse Luketa, Jeremiah Pharms, Casey Rogers
The Globe's initial 53-man roster projection had five defensive linemen and five edge rushers making the final cut. But that split has since swayed in favor of an extra D-lineman because the competition between Taylor, Gregory, and Farmer has been tight. The Patriots also could use extra depth, given Barmore's load management this summer.
On the edge, probably the team's biggest area of concern, the Patriots could be in trouble, especially if Landry remains on the physically unable to perform list. Ponder will be tested in an elevated role. Jacas is still catching up after missing the spring. Swinson, despite dropping almost 20 pounds, seems better suited for the practice squad.

Linebackers (4)

In: Robert Spillane, Christian Elliss, K.J. Britt, Khalil Jacobs
Out: Chad Muma, Namdi Obiazor, Riley Wilson
If depth on the edge is the defense's top concern, depth at linebacker is close behind. Britt, who played primarily on special teams last season with the Dolphins, has flashed during the preseason. So has Jacobs, but he's banged up. Obiazor would be a good fit for the practice squad if he clears waivers.

Cornerbacks (5)

In: Christian Gonzalez, Carlton Davis, Marcus Jones, Kindle Vildor, Karon Prunty
Out: Channing Canada, Brandon Crossley, Marcellas Dial, Kobe Minor, Charles Woods
The backup cornerbacks all had their fair share of struggles in the third preseason game. But Vildor has been one of the biggest risers during practice, taking advantage of his extra reps when Gonzalez was sidelined. He and Prunty will all also play on special teams. Woods, though he can also play special teams, has struggled lately, most notably Thursday. Canada, an undrafted rookie, had his moments during camp, but not enough to earn a spot.

Safeties (5)

In: Kevin Byard, Craig Woodson, Jaylen Reed, Dell Pettus, Brenden Schooler
Out: Mike Brown, Eric Butler, Peter Manuma, John Saunders
The Patriots have a strong starting tandem of Byard and Woodson, so the newly acquired Reed may be focused on special teams to start his Patriots tenure. Last season, as a rookie for the Texans, Reed (6 feet, 212 pounds) played 73 snaps on defense and 113 on special teams, before suffering a forearm injury that sidelined him for the final five games of the regular season.

Special teamers (3)

Out: Matt Haack
Baringer's injury is worth monitoring, after Haack punted in the preseason finale. Even though Borregales missed three field goals in the preseason opener, the staff never brought in any competition and seemed to attribute at least part of his struggles to working with a different long snapper at the time. Now that Ashby has returned from his ankle injury, Borregales has bounced back.

Special teams got the job done

By Christopher Price
GLOBE STAFF

CLEVELAND — The Patriots' specialists have been rolling with the punches all summer. Now, with the regular season coming into view, don't expect them to change their approach.

This summer, injuries have forced New England to use two long snappers, as well as two punters. As a result, the Patriots have been forced to do some shuffling. In their 37-13 loss to the host Browns on Thursday, the operation appeared to go off without a hiccup.

New England utilized newly acquired punter Matt Haack in place of Bryce Baringer, who is dealing with an unknown injury. Haack was the Patriots' best and most consistent performer in an otherwise ugly loss, dropping three of his four punts inside the Cleveland 20 — including one at the 2 — and averaging 46.5 yards per opportunity.

Haack's performance certainly begs the question: With cuts looming, could New England be forced to make a change at punter? If Baringer were to be lost for any amount of time, the Patriots would seem to be in good hands with the 32-year-old Haack, who has punted for nine seasons in the NFL and has a career 45-yard average.

Haack was cagey Thursday night as to whether his latest opportunity was presented to him as a competition with Baringer, or if he was brought in to simply hold Baringer's spot.

"There's usually not a whole lot of information. Usually the teams will call my agent, my

After a shaky preseason start, Andy Borregales had a strong finishing kick with field goals of 26 and 33 yards Thursday.

agent will call me, and it's, 'Hey, we're going to New England,' " said Haack, who has punted for six teams in his career. "That's pretty much all I get.

"Usually, if I'm getting a call, I know it's some sort of opportunity. I don't exactly know what that is all the time. But like I said, I'm just ready to move on in the instant and go from there."

The only special teams constant through the summer, kicker Andy Borregales — with Haack serving as his holder — made field goal attempts of 26 and 33 yards and his only extra-point try Thursday.

Borregales hasn't missed a kick since he missed three field goals in the preseason opener against the Colts, a game in which the Patriots didn't have long snapper Julian Ashby, who was out with an ankle issue.

Borregales said he and Baringer enjoyed a good relationship last season, their first together.

"I've been with him . . . a year and a half now," Borregales said. "He knows there's some things that I don't have to tell him that he immediately does. Like, if there's wind he'll tilt it without telling me. He'll tell me after the kick, 'Hey, I leaned it a little bit more for you.' It's that connection that you know you have to build."

Haack served as the holder for Borregales for the first time in game action Thursday.

"If someone's new, you know, just get that rhythm going and get everyone on the same page," Borregales said. "Obviously it's definitely a learning curve for me that I had to deal with in Week 1 of the preseason. But you know, it is what it is, and you learn from it and move on."

"I've been through this a bunch, so I kind of know how to navigate it by now," Haack said. "If they're comfortable, then I'm comfortable. So I'm constantly asking them questions like, 'This OK? That OK?' So yeah, my biggest goal is that they're comfortable and the trust is there, and then go from there."

As the regular season looms, Borregales and Ashby said their philosophy moving forward is simple, regardless of who's out there.

"We're just trying to be where our feet are. Just go at it day by day, and go from there," Borregales said. "It's just the NFL. There's going to be a lot of moving parts, no matter what. You've just got to go out there, and at the end of the day, do your job. You know, and that's just the business side of it."

"I think whoever's available week to week is just who we're rolling with," said Ashby. "And making sure that the operation is clean, regardless of who's in those three spots, is something that we've really tried to do."

"Andy's kind of been the constant, and he's done really well handling whoever's in there snapping or holding. I think just as a group, everybody's done a great job."

Cousins looks set to lead Raiders at QB

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Raiders coach Klint Kubiak still hasn't announced a starting quarterback with the regular season two weeks away. However all indications are Kirk Cousins likely will be behind center when the Raiders open their season Sept. 13 against the Dolphins.

Cousins received the lion's share of first-team snaps in training camp and was the starter in the two preseason games he played.

He carries the experience of what will be his 15th NFL season as the Raiders bring along rookie and No. 1 overall draft pick Fernando Mendoza. All three drives Cousins quarterbacked this preseason ended in points — a touchdown and two field goals.

"I just think he's taking practice to the field," Kubiak said Friday. "He's led scoring drives. We would have loved to lead three touchdown scoring drives, so we're not satisfied with field goals, and that's an area that we need to improve at. But I see a guy that's leading the offense."

Kubiak and general manager John Spytek have to decide whether to keep three quarterbacks when they cut the roster to 53 players on Sunday.

Aidan O'Connell is in his fourth season, all with the Raiders, and he could be the first one onto the field should Cousins get injured or struggle. That would give Mendoza even more time to develop — if the coaches go that route.

Raiders rout Commanders

Tyler Huntley and Joe Fagnano each threw a touchdown pass in a dominant first half for the Ravens, who wrapped up their 3-0 preseason schedule with a 41-3 rout of the Commanders in Baltimore.

The Ravens finished with a 26-7 edge in first downs, with the Commanders getting three of theirs on the very last drive. The Ravens also had a 456-177 advantage in total yards.

Ravens kicker Tyler Loop made field goals of 51 and 24 yards but missed from 51 and 58.

Loop, whose miss at the end of last season kept the Ravens out of the playoffs, went 5 of 8 on field goals in three exhibition games this year.

Jets rookie RB hospitalized

Jets rookie running back Chip Trayanum was taken to a hospital after being carted off the field with a neck injury after being tackled during the final play of the first half of a 23-6 loss to the Giants.

The Jets announced Trayanum, an undrafted rookie from Toledo, was awake, alert, and had movement in all of his extremities.

"I think he'll be just fine," coach Aaron Glenn said after the game. "He'll be just fine."

The Jets had the ball with 10 seconds left before halftime Friday night and decided to run a play. Trayanum took the handoff and was immediately hit.

Trainers and doctors rushed to examine him as players and coaches remained on the field.

Trayanum scored the Jets' lone touchdown of the opening half, a 1-yard run that capped an opening drive on which he carried the ball nine times in 10 plays. Trayanum had 38 yards on 12 plays for the game.

Tagovailoa beats Dolphins

Tua Tagovailoa led a 60-yard touchdown drive but lost a fumble while playing the first quarter against his former team as the Falcons beat the Dolphins, 17-12. Tagovailoa was booed as he took the field in Miami Gardens, Fla., and finished 7 of 8 for 95 yards while playing three series. The 28-year-old spent his first six seasons with the Dolphins before they released him in March . . . Zach Wilson led a scoring drive resulting in Daniel Carlson's 53-yard field goal with 1:55 remaining in the Saints' 27-24 victory over the Cowboys in Arlington, Texas. Sam Howell threw two fourth-quarter touchdown passes and had a tying 2-point conversion run for the Cowboys . . . Veteran Josh Johnson threw for 156 yards in the first half, Evan McPherson kicked a 56-yarder for one of his three field goals and the Bengals capped a perfect preseason with a 30-13 victory over the Eagles in Philadelphia . . . Rookie Miles Davis ran for a 1-yard touchdown, Ryan Fitzgerald kicked three field goals, and the Panthers held on to defeat the Texans, 16-13, in the preseason finale for both teams. . . . Tony Romo is facing three more citations in connection with his arrest last month that got him placed on leave from his role as CBS's lead analyst on NFL games. Romo, 46, was arrested July 23 in Wisconsin on suspicion of operating a vehicle while under the influence. The case against the former Cowboys quarterback was amended Thursday to add citations for possessing open intoxicants in a motor vehicle, unsafe passing on the right, and first-offense operating while intoxicated.

Red Sox appear to have pitching prospects in pipeline

By Alex Speier
GLOBE STAFF

At the end of 2025, the Red Sox had flipped perception regarding their farm system. After an extreme, years-long tilt toward position players, the Red Sox entered last offseason with one of the more robust groups of young pitchers in baseball. With the big league debuts of Payton Tolle and Connelly Early, a 2025 draft class loaded with arms such as Kyson Witherspoon, Marcus Phillips, and Anthony Eyanson, and big lower-levels arms, the Sox appeared loaded with pitchers.

The landscape has changed over the last 10 months. While the Sox have received huge contributions from homegrown starters Tolle and (before he was traded in July) Early, their pitching pipeline looks very different now after 22 pitchers moved in 15 deals.

Of the 13 highest-ranked pitchers in last season's Baseball America's preliminary Red Sox top 30 prospect list, nine have been dealt: Early (Curtis Mead), Luis Peralas (Jake Bennett), Witherspoon (Adley Rutschman), Yhoiker Fajardo (Willson Contreras), David Sandlin (Gage Ziehl), Eyanson (Rutschman), Jesus Travieso (Johan Oviedo), Shane Drohan (Caleb Durbin), and Tyler Uberstine (Eli White).

"With everyone traded, you're just like, 'I love that guy!' But I rationalize it as, my history with the Yankees is they trade everybody, so I'm used to this," said Red Sox director of pitching Ben Buck, a pitching coach for the Yankees from 2020-24. "Our goal is to impact the major league baseball team. That'll either happen through promotions directly impacting [the team] or providing the capital to be able to help in other ways."

For the most part, the deals underscore the success of the Red Sox' player development program. Nearly every pitcher dealt by the Sox made significant improvements while members of the organization.

But now, with so many top pitching prospects having moved, the Sox face a "prove-it" moment while trying to sustain the pipeline. Does the team's pitching department feel a need to hit the gas pedal to rebuild depth?

"We already did before the trade deadline," said Buck. "You're already thinking about creating more depth, more pieces."

The pitching prospects with the highest ceilings are years away from the big leagues. Juan Valera, who turned 20 in May, got off to a jaw-dropping start in High-A Greenville, reaching 102 miles per hour before he blew out his elbow and required Tommy John surgery. He profiles as a potential mid-rotation starter or late-innings reliever, but won't pitch in games before late 2027.

Righthander Sadiel Delzine, 18, has been a head-turner in the Florida Complex League and Single-A Salem. At 6 foot 5 inches and 240 pounds, he has a starter's build and the control and stuff to match, with a 96-98-m.p.h. fastball that is scraping 100 m.p.h. as well as a swing-and-miss changeup.

Though likely two to three years from the big leagues, Delzine has the attention of evaluators around the industry. He's struck out 31 percent of batters since moving up to full-season ball with an 8 percent walk rate.

"He's electric," said Buck. "He's this giant human throwing really hard, and I don't think physically he's even close to who he's gonna be."

In the near-term, the Sox have a number of potential big leaguers with more modest ceilings who recently moved from Double-A Portland to Triple-A Worcester.

Righthander Gage Ziehl, a 2024 fourth-round pick of the Yankees who was then traded to the White Sox last summer and the Red Sox in the winter, has made numerous intriguing adjustments. Last offseason, even before the Red Sox acquired him, he lowered his arm slot after raising it when he entered pro ball in an effort to create swing-and-miss at the top of the zone.

The lower slot was more comfortable, effective, and deceptive, improving the movement of his fastball and creating a foundation from which Ziehl has added a changeup and sinker, giving him six pitches he's been able to land in the strike zone.

"He presents so many problems for a hitter to solve," said Portland pitching coach Juan Rivera.

Righthander John Holobetz, a 24-year-old acquired from the Brewers in last year's Quinn Priester deal, seemingly sets personal records in velocity every outing, recently reaching 98.2 m.p.h. With above-average velocity now added to his low-release arm slot, his Double-A strikeout rate jumped from 20 percent last year to 28 percent this year.

"He started overwhelming hitters," said Rivera. Righthander Blake Wehunt, whose 6-7 frame allows him to generate above-average extension, is throwing harder (sitting at 94 m.p.h.) with a sharpened changeup that's been shaped into a bat-docking weapon, the best pitch in his seven-pitch mix.

And 22-year-old righthander Jedixson Paez — who was taken last winter by the White Sox in the Rule 5 draft, but returned to the Red Sox — has finally been able to hold some velocity gains, sitting at 92-93 m.p.h. with his four-seamer and sinker, good enough to leave hitters lunging at his changeup (62.5 percent whiff rate in Triple-A).

Still, the pitchers in Worcester largely look like works in progress rather than plug-and-play impact options. No one is the equivalent of what Early provided the Sox last year as a turnkey rotation candidate.

The Sox thus must prove that their ability to help young pitchers improve is repeatable so that they can keep supplying young pitchers to help the big league team, whether as call-ups or trade candidates.

Schlittler, Yankees blank Sox play all three games at recently revived Fenway Park?

“That’s important. I won’t shy away from that,” interim manager Chad Tracy said before the game. “If you have a short series in the playoffs and you’re able to play in front of your home crowd, [if nothing else] it could be fun to play in front of your home crowd.

“But it’s a home-field advantage when you’re playing at home, for most people. It wasn’t for us for a while, but it has been lately. If you get a short series, you’re able to play in your home ballpark, that stuff matters, for sure.”

The season series is up for grabs the next two days, too. The Red Sox are 5-5 against the Yankees; the club that wins two more will clinch the tiebreaker, relevant only if they finish the regular season with the same record.

The difficulty of the Red Sox pulling off the above ticked up in the teams’ first contest in two months. The game hinged on a small handful of moments, at least two of which were Rafaela-centric.

With two on and one out in the fifth, their best chance against Schlittler, Wilyer Abreu lined out to center fielder Trent Grisham. Rafaela wandered way off first base and was doubled off for an inning-ending double play. He called it a “bad read” and thought the ball would drop in.

In the seventh, Rafaela was on third and Abreu was on second with one out, Willson Contreras up against reliever Paul Blackburn.

Contreras lofted a 262-foot flyout to left field. Rafaela tried to score, but Cody Bellinger’s practically perfect throw — unleashed at 99.7 miles per hour — was on target and on time to get Rafaela again.

Rafaela fessed up afterward that he headed home on his own, disregarding instruction from interim third base coach Chad Epperson not to do so.

“That’s on me. That’s not him. That’s on me,” Rafaela said. “Trying to be over-aggressive. Those things happen.”

In his apparent transparency, Rafaela contradicted his manager. Moments prior, Tracy said Epperson told Rafaela to go.

“Oh yeah, we were all screaming. That’s a definite, especially at that point in the game,” Tracy said. “It’s been a bit since we scored. You don’t know how many opportunities you’re going to get, so you got to go there and force a — if you get a [throw that is a] little bit off line in one direction, with Rafa running, you’re going to be safe. And [Bellinger] made a perfect throw.”

The Red Sox finished 1 for 7 with men in scoring position and left 10 runners on base.

It marked the first time since September 2023 that the Sox have been shut out in consecutive games. They most recently scored Tuesday in Miami.

“Today was not for a lack of runners or opportunities, that’s for sure,” Tracy said.

Lefthander Patrick Sandoval contributed what Tracy called his best start of the year, 5½ innings and one run. Paul Goldschmidt homered — 430 feet to left-center field — in the third.

Schlittler, a former Northeastern standout and a current favorite for the AL Cy Young Award, was not his most dominant self. He matched a career high with five walks, all to the bottom half of the lineup.

But he also struck out eight, including Nick Sogard looking at a cutter in the fifth inning for the 200th of his season — in just 162⅓ innings.

Schlittler became the fourth Yankee to reach the 200-strikeout threshold at age 25 or younger, joining Luis Severino, Al Downing, and Bob Turley. He also became just the second pitcher drafted and signed by the Yankees to hit that number — at any age — alongside Ron Guidry.

Schlittler leads the AL with a 2.09 ERA.

“It’s a great win,” he said. “[His personal season has] been good so far. Obviously, there’s a lot of ball left to play, and the goal is to win a championship. So whatever I can do to help this team win games, and if that means putting up those numbers, it’s a great feeling.”

In five games against the Sox, postseason and regular season, Schlittler owns a 0.56 ERA. That is two earned runs in 32⅓ innings.

For now, though, the Red Sox are done with Schlittler. They won’t see him again until that potential postseason rematch — in the Bronx or in Boston.

First rivalry game features Sandoval at his best the Yankees needed as the Sox were held to three hits in a 1-0 loss.

Welcome to the rivalry, Patrick. These things happen.

Sandoval had pitched at Yankee Stadium for the Angels in 2023. But he acknowledged there was something different about taking that same mound in a Red Sox uniform.

“When I walked out to go warm up, definitely felt the energy of the stadium and the historic rivalry,” he said. “It’s fun to be a part of that.”

Goldschmidt’s home run came on a respectable pitch, a 95.6-mile-per-hour sinker that caught the bottom edge of the strike zone. But Goldschmidt stayed on the ball and drove it 430 feet into the bleachers in left field.

It was Goldschmidt’s 10th home run against a lefthander this season. Beyond that, Sandoval held the Yankees down and gave the Sox a chance to win the game.

With a doubleheader Saturday, Tracy pushed Sandoval into the sixth inning. He walked Heliot Ramos and Trent Grisham to load the bases with one out. Greg Weissert came in and retired George Lombard on a line drive to shallow right field, then struck out Jazz Chisholm Jr.

Tracy thought it was Sandoval’s best start of the season.

“Just from a standpoint of controlling counts, limiting walks, and attacking the zone,” he said. “I thought he was really, really good.”

YUKI IWAMURA/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Red Sox interim manager Chad Tracy gets the ball from starter Patrick Sandoval in the sixth inning of Friday night’s series opener against the Yankees at the Stadium.

Sandoval waited a long time for a game like this. The Sox signed him to a two-year, $18.5 million contract before the 2025 season while he was recovering from Tommy John surgery.

The hope was that he would pitch after the All-Star break in 2025, but his Sox debut didn’t come until July 9 of this season. Sandoval has since allowed two or fewer runs in seven of his nine starts, and the Sox are 6-3 when he pitches.

His 4.20 earned run average is skewed by a poor start at Pittsburgh on Aug. 16 when he allowed seven runs on nine hits over four innings in an 8-3 loss.

“That’s what you want to do as a baseball player is play in these big games, high leverage, something on the line,” Sandoval said. “It’s been a long time since I’ve been able to do that. So this was really fun, and I was really grateful for this opportunity.”

It would have been more fun had the Sox not gone 1 for 7 with runners in scoring position and left 10 runners on base. That left him with a loss.

The Sox have 28 games remaining and will need Sandoval to chew up innings as they monitor the workload of rookie lefthanders Jake Bennett and Payton Tolle.

“I feel like I’m trending up,” Sandoval said. “That’s the goal, to go out there and get better every day. I’m proud of the work I’m putting in each day. Just hoping the results can reflect that.”

RED SOX NOTEBOOK

Patience the key factor in rehab recalls

By Tim Healey

GLOBE STAFF

NEW YORK — The new fastest-case scenario for the returns of Roman Anthony and Trevor Story: Sunday.

That is no guarantee, though, as the Red Sox practice patience with both players working their way back from long-term injuries.

Both were off Friday and are set to play again for Triple-A Worcester on Saturday, interim manager Chad Tracy said.

The reasoning behind not activating Anthony or Story for most or perhaps all of this critical four-game series against the Yankees? They aren’t ready yet.

“I don’t think we’re far off, but we’re going to — while we have the time — make sure we use it,” Tracy said before the series-opening 1-0 loss at the Stadium.

“I think a lot of people have the perception that maybe we circled a date on the calendar. When you’re out for 3½ months, it’s difficult to circle a date on the calendar [and declare]. ‘So they’ll be back then.’

“It’s more about just continuing to walk through not only physically how they feel, but walk through reps, timing, all those things. So we’ll keep talking to them and figure it out. Sunday’s possible, but we’ll see how they feel after Saturday.”

Anthony (sprained right hand/wrist) has been out since early May. Story (sports hernia surgery) hasn’t played since mid-May.

Across seven games with Worcester and Double-A Portland, Anthony is 7 for 23 with two homers, two doubles, seven strikeouts, and three walks. In nine games, all with Worcester, Story is 5 for 32 with no extra-base hits, 10 strikeouts, and one walk.

“Physically, they feel like they’re close to being ready, but then you still know that they’re working through stuff as far as game play,” Tracy said. “Hey, I feel good, I can compete, probably an extra at-bat here wouldn’t hurt.’ So that’s where we’re at.”

It helps, of course, that Mickey Gasper had a huge week or so as the primary designated hitter and the middle infield has remained just fine sans Story. The Red Sox aren’t desperate.

“With the injuries we had, particularly in the infield, I think a lot of people probably [expect] when you’re tapping that far into your depth . . . OK, that’ll fall apart,” Tracy said.

“It speaks volume of the guys. Everybody that’s come up has been awesome.”

Isiah Kiner-Falefa (left forearm stress reaction) also was off Friday and will play Saturday with Worcester. He is more likely to return Tuesday, the annual Sept. 1 expansion of active rosters to 28 players.

Whitlock on deck

The Red Sox “likely” will bring reliever Garrett Whitlock (right elbow inflammation) back from the injured list Saturday, Tracy said.

CHAD TRACY
Says Sunday possible for pair

Why not Friday? Because he faced hitters in a practice setting Wednesday, and the Red Sox didn’t want to use him twice in three days immediately after his stint of not pitching at all. (Such a scenario also would have rendered him unavailable for the doubleheader Saturday.)

This way, Whitlock will return fresh, following consecutive days off.

Rutschman returns

Adley Rutschman was back in the lineup Friday night, playing catcher and batting fifth, after missing the previous two games because of a hyper-extended right elbow. He wore a sleeve on that arm, but is generally fine.

“He’s good,” Tracy said. “I put him in [the lineup] with the expectation he could play, and then he was going to come in and hit and throw. He did all those things early and felt good. So we got him back.”

Rutschman entered the game in a 1-for-17 slide, and went hitless in four at-bats, with two strikeouts. Take out his pair of two-hit games against Arizona back on Aug. 17-18, and in his other 11 games for the Sox the former Oriole is just 2 for 36 at the plate, with 14 strikeouts and five walks.

Crochet advances

Garrett Crochet (left shoulder injury) has advanced to “mound catch,” Tracy said. That is less than a full-fledged bullpen session but more than regular catch . . . Tanner Houck (Tommy John surgery) faced hitters for the fourth time Friday and will graduate Tuesday to pitching in a scrimmage with low-level minor leaguers . . . The Red Sox signed veteran catcher Tomas Nido to a minor league contract, and assigned him to Triple-A Worcester . . . In attendance at Yankee Stadium: former Red Sox and Yankees reliever Adam Ottavino, who was credentialed as a photographer. He has pursued broadcasting/multimedia endeavors since last pitching last year.

Unheralded (until recently) Gasper embodies these never-say-die Sox

► FINN

when he homered in three straight games against the Diamondbacks, and then a two-homer game Tuesday against the Marlins.

It’s fitting in a couple of ways that Gasper was doing this in immediate advance of a critical four-game series against the Yankees in New York.

Gasper entered professional baseball as the Yankees’ 27th-round pick in the 2018 draft, remaining in the organization through 2023 and advancing to Triple-A. And he’s having one of those insane hot stretches by an unheralded call-up, like Kevin Maas in 1990 or Shane Spencer in ’98, that always seemed to be the fortunate domain of the Yankees.

But yes, more than anything, Gasper embodies these Red Sox. Just like he was, they were written off early in the season with what sure looked like valid reasons, only to find some magic that still isn’t entirely explicable, and yet is so fun that you are left with no choice but to believe.

The Red Sox were 32-46 after an 8-6 loss to the Rockies on June 24. They have gone 41-15 since, carrying a 73-61 record and an argument as the best team in the American League into this Yankees series.

As stunning as it was, there were several reasons for their turnaround: superb starting pitching on a nightly basis; an unassailable back end of the bullpen; easily the best outfield defense in baseball; timely hitting; and an abundance of overdue luck finally bouncing their way.

But the success had to be considered beyond remarkable, because the Red Sox did it and have continued to do it with an assortment of players who were fairly perceived as replacement level.

Those season-rescuers include Andruw Monasterio, Anthony Seigler, Nick Sogard, Jahmai Jones, and even Jake Rogers for three games.

I must admit, I’m still not sure what to make of some of these guys, at least in the grand scheme of the organization. I’ve had a reader emailing me for nearly three years now that Sogard deserves a real chance. I scoffed, given that this is his age-28 season, and he had a .656 OPS in 190 plate appearances over the 2024-25 seasons.

So, what’s happened? Sogard has basically been the infielder version of Gasper, getting on base at a .379 clip with a .771 OPS. I still fear that some of these fantastic fill-ins will prove to be like Pedro Ciriaco in 2012, the BABIP god who wasn’t really a big leaguer once his luck ran out.

My greater fear? I’m going to have to eat a crow for the Sogard superfan. A heaping helping, even.

Which brings us to the quandary, the dilemma, and even the conundrum that the Red Sox face at the moment. Some of the underperforming bigger-name players these guys stepped in for are ready to return from injury — or, in Trevor Story’s case, claim they are despite no concurring statistical evidence from a rehab assignment.

Interim manager Chad Tracy has had to navigate various tricky circumstances during his 107 games and 63 victories on the job, but none trickier than this. Who plays more? The presumed replacement-level types who teamed up to help save the season? Or the more established and/or highly regarded ones who were among the reasons the Red Sox ended up in a ditch to start the season?

Talented Roman Anthony is going to usurp some of Gasper’s at-bats. And Story is going to be the Red Sox’ short-stop on most nights, despite a vast majority of fans not wanting this.

They’d better perform. The stakes are high. The last few weeks of games have meaning and importance.

It did not look like that would be the case when they got hurt. But you know what happened: Gasper and those supposed replacement-level players performed so well that appreciative Red Sox fans now dread some of them being replaced.

Skubal gets his tribute in Detroit

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Tarik Skubal shed some tears, walking on a field that used to be his home turf as the team that traded him away paid tribute to the two-time Cy Young Award winner with a video montage before the first pitch.

“Luckily enough, I was able to make it to the tunnel before more happened,” Skubal said after allowing one run over six innings to help the Dodgers beat the host Tigers, 2-1, on Friday night. “It’s tough. This is the place I’ve known my entire career since 2018. It’s special.”

Freddie Freeman hit a tiebreaking single in the seventh inning. Evan Phillips (2-2), Brock Stewart, and Alex Vesia combined for three innings of scoreless relief, and Tanner Scott pitched the ninth for his 20th save in 22 chances.

Skubal was welcomed with cheers and a smattering of boos in his return to Detroit, pitching for the first time against the middling franchise that traded him to the two-time defending World Series champions.

When the visitors’ lineup and Skubal were shown on the videoboard and his name was announced before the first pitch, most of the crowd at Comerica Park clapped for him while some jeered.

After the game, Skubal returned to the field to catch up with some of his former teammates.

During the game, Skubal struck out seven over six innings with 83 pitches, the fewest since he threw 74 in the season-opening game in March.

Rays thump Padres

Yandy Diaz and Cedric Mullins each homered and drove in two runs and the AL-leading Rays scored five runs in the fourth inning on the way to a 9-4 victory over the visiting Padres.

Chandler Simpson had two hits, two stolen bases, and scored twice as the Rays (80-54) won for the fourth time in five games and became the first team in the American League to reach 80 wins.

Shane McClellan (10-6) allowed three hits and four runs, three earned, with two walks and four strikeouts in 5½ innings. The 29-year-old lefthander improved to 8-1 at home.

Earlier, the Rays got county approval on a financing plan that will allow them to build a stadium, a day after city officials approved their part for the $2.3 billion ballpark project that will replace the domed Tropicana Field.

The Hillsborough County Commission voted, 5-2, to approve its $796 million share of the mixed-use entertainment district that includes a new 31,000-seat stadium that will be near Raymond James Stadium, home of the NFL’s Buccaneers. The Rays’ new stadium is expected to open in 2029.

Braves keep rolling

Michael Harris II drove in three runs on two hits, including a homer, Ronald Acuña Jr. had three hits and three runs, and the Braves beat the visiting Rockies, 6-4, for their fifth straight win. Righthander Grant Holmes (9-5) allowed three runs on eight hits — all singles — in five innings for Atlanta. Before the game, the Braves announced righthanders Spencer Schwellenbach and Hurston Waldrep would have season-ending elbow surgeries . . . Dylan Cease struck out eight in six innings and George Springer was 4 for 4 with a home run as the host Blue Jays beat the Mariners, 8-1. Cease (9-5) has 217 strikeouts to lead the AL. The only pitcher in the majors with more is Milwaukee’s Jacob Misiorowski with 222.

BARE KNUCKLE FIGHTING CHAMPIONSHIP

Lauzon jumped at being on Fenway card

By Andrew Mahoney
GLOBE STAFF

It will be close to seven years since his last fight when Joe Lauzon steps into the squared circle at home plate at Fenway Park on Saturday night. Now 42, the UFC veteran will be making his debut in the Bare Knuckle Fighting Championship.

The Bridgewater native doesn't mince words when asked how much of a role the opportunity to fight at the home of the Red Sox played in his decision to join Saturday's card.

"One hundred percent," Lauzon responded before the question was even finished. "Fighting bare knuckle, [it's] not the most tempting thing for me. It's definitely a different level of excitement. But it was Fenway; Fenway was the draw for me."

Lauzon had hoped for one more fight in the UFC and went through an extended camp in 2022, but his scheduled fight with Donald "Cowboy" Cerrone was canceled twice.

It's been a long layoff, but the ring rust may not be as bad considering Lauzon has remained active as the owner and instructor for a pair of martial arts academies, Lauzon MMA, in Raynham and Canton.

His welterweight (165 pounds) clash with fellow MMA veteran Stash Kuykendall is listed as the featured matchup, just before the women's bantamweight matchup between Christine Ferea and Sofia Landi, which serves as the penultimate fight of the night and the co-main event.

The featherweight championship match between title-holder Kai Stewart and Haverhill native Harry Gigliotti is the ticket topper.

After appearing in 43 mixed martial arts contests, including the last 28 in the UFC, Lauzon will have to make a few adjustments as he moves over to the bare knuckle game. MMA fights are scheduled for three rounds at five minutes each (unless it's the main event, which are five rounds). BKFC fights are scheduled for five two-minute rounds, and only punching is allowed.

"There's a bigger chance of getting cut from a punch in this, but I'm not going to get kneed. I'm not going to get elbowed. I'm not going to get kicked," said Lauzon. "I think there's a lot more cuts in this, but I think a lot more broken hands. But if a broken hand is the worst thing, I don't think that's really the end of the world."

Cuts are indeed more common in BKFC, where fighters are permitted to wrap and tape only their wrists, thumbs, and mid-hand. No gauze or tape can be within an inch of the knuckles. According to BKFC president and founder Dave Feldman, the organization has two plastic surgeons on staff, both of whom will be on hand Saturday night to handle cuts after each fight.

Lauzon believes combatants have to be a little more calculated fighting bare knuckle.

"If I have gloves on, I'm just biting on my mouthpiece and I'm swinging as hard as I can," said Lauzon. "Here, you've got to be a little bit more precise with your punches. You've got to aim a little bit better. You've got to really ensure you don't punch the top of someone's head or punch an elbow or things like that."

Peter Barrett, who works and trains with Lauzon, is also on the card and will face Elijah Harris. The Abington native already made the transition from the UFC, winning his first two fights while competing as a lightweight (155 pounds). He points to his conditioning, and his Muay Thai clinch that he developed in 15 years in MMA, as keys to success in those fights.

"You're really effective with short, straight punches," said Barrett, who turned 40 this month. "As long as you're holding on and you're striking, they'll let you fight. If the striking slows down, they'll break the clinch. But everything with my Muay Thai clinch is translating beautifully for bare knuckle boxing."

Other New England fighters on the card include another former UFC competitor, Peabody native Charles Rosa; Rico DiSciullo (Somerville), Pat Casey (Springfield), Robinson Perez (Southbridge), James Murrin (South Boston), Jake Pilla (Billerica), and David Burke (Somersworth, N.H.).

Doors open at 5 p.m., with the preliminary fights starting at 6. The main card begins at 7.

PGA TOUR CHAMPIONSHIP

Gerard, Hovland in tie for first place

ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA — Ryan Gerard hit it well enough for five relatively easy birdies Friday and dropped a surprise from just inside 80 feet for another, giving him a 5-under-par 65 and a share of the 36-hole lead with Viktor Hovland at the season-ending Tour Championship.

Hovland had one of five birdies on the peninsula-green 15th hole, a par 3 at only 155 yards but tucked to the left near a sharp slope that feeds off the putting surface. He had a 66 to join Gerard at 10-under 130 going into the weekend.

Right behind? Just about everybody.

That includes Scottie Scheffler, the world's No. 1 player who had a 67 and was two back. And it included Cameron Young, in last place after the first round and atop the leaderboard for much of the day after a 62. He also wound up two behind.

Collin Morikawa and Chris Gotterup each shot 67 and were one behind at 9-under 131.

Gerard has more on his mind than the $10 million prize and the five-year exemption on the PGA Tour. The captain's picks for the Presidents Cup will be announced after the Tour Championship, and it's on the mind of the 27-year-old from North Carolina.

"It's hard not to think about it a little bit," Gerard said. "I'm very aware that a good week this week goes a long way to help my chances. I'm playing this week for myself and to try and put up some good scores and hopefully win a trophy at the end of the week."

The trophies — one for the Tour Championship and one for the FedEx Cup — are up for grabs. One third of the field is separated by three shots on a course that has relatively soft with either rain Thursday or overcast Friday, even with a little wind late in the day.

No one took advantage quite like Young, who remains in the picture for PGA Tour player of the year with his signature win at The Players Championship and a big win at a signature event at Doral.

He opened with two early bogeys in the opening round when everyone was going low and jokingly said it made him wonder about his career choice. He shot 70 that left him tied for last place and going off as a single Friday in the 29-man field, as J.J. Spaun has withdrawn.

He made the turn in 30, and then poured in two more birdies to reach 7 under through 11 holes. Young cooled slightly with a bogey from the bunker at the 12th and missed opportunities the rest of the way until a 40-foot eagle putt slammed into the back of the cup on the par-5 18th for a 62.

The put him in a tie for the lead as the final group was starting, and Young would have been a little surprised to be within two shots by the end of the round. Low scores were there, and he had reason to believe someone would motor well past him.

"I was in last place about 3½ hours ago," Young said. "There's not much wind today, and the field seems to be playing pretty well for even par being last place after yesterday. I think I can pat myself on the back for shooting 8 under, but that doesn't change how much work there is left to even give yourself a chance."

He ended the way with a mock handshake for the partner he didn't have. Young didn't race his way around the course. It felt like a practice round he plays by himself. There was one moment where it looked like any recreational round when he removed the flag on No. 12 and set it on the fringe because his caddie was busy raking the bunker.

Now that single falls to Robert MacIntyre, the only player not under par at East Lake. MacIntyre shot a 76 — eight shots over the field average — and was 13 shots behind.

Scheffler had two early bogeys to fall five shots behind and then answered with five birdies in a stretch of six holes.

Khang states her case by making the cut

By Michael Silverman
GLOBE STAFF

NORTON — After two days, half the field of Massachusetts golfers is left at the FM Championship.

Granted, there were only two to start with — Megan Khang of Rockland and Alexa Pano of Westborough — but only Khang will be on hand for the third round Saturday.

Khang shot a 3-under 69, four strokes better than her opening-round effort, to move to 2 under — plenty good enough to make the cut and earn two more days of golf at TPC Boston.

"Honestly, I'm just really happy to make the weekend, it's been a while since I've been able to play the weekend," said Khang, who had missed the cut in seven of her last eight tournaments.

"To be here, in my home state, home sponsor [Khang is a brand ambassador for Rhode Island-based FM], I'm very happy to make the weekend and just really happy to see some putts go in."

Khang began her day 1 over, but after birdies on Nos. 2 and 3, she was 1 under. After 14 holes she was 4 under with no bogeys yet, but dropped shots on 15 and 17, however, put a crimp on her day.

"It was a little bit of a sour finish," said Khang. "I just missed the fairway on 15, and it's a tough putt back there, but I tried to putt, did my best. I was really happy to get up-and-down on 16."

"And then on 17, I think on my second shot, my club just got a little stuck, and so I kind of shut it down a little left. And for anyone who's not playing, left is pretty much dead to that pin right now. I gave myself a chance at par but guess I just didn't really trust the line there. But, to have a really good two-putt on 18 was a nice finish."

Pano, who began the round at 6 over, went 6 over again with another 78, her ninth missed cut in 16 starts this year. She's currently sitting 90th in the Race to the CME Globe rankings, and she needs to stay in the top 100 to keep her Tour card for next year.

I've been chasing the win for a little bit, but my coach told me at the beginning of the week, he was just like, 'Your game is right there. You just need to be a little bit more patient.' "

Patience was the key word among the leaders, as well.

Corpuz went bogey-free Friday and shot a 5-under 67. She said she's comfortable on this course following top-20 finishes in each of the previous FM Championships.

Two years ago at this time, she was 3 under before surging

ALEX SLITZ/GETTY IMAGES

Anna Nordqvist, who is ready to retire at 39, has more golf to play at the FM Championship after carding a 4-under 68.

Not done yet

Thirty-nine-year-old Anna Nordqvist, who is retiring after this tourney, shot 68 to move to 2 under and add two days to her career that began in 2009.

"I guess I've always wanted to finish on a high," the Swede said. "Playing good yesterday, just being in those really gusty winds, being hard to score, get close to the holes, I feel like it was just one of those days. Like, really determined to try to do everything I can to be able to play the weekend."

Suvichaya Vinijchaitham started the day with five consecutive birdies, six in her first eight holes, for a 7-under 65. She went into the weekend tied for ninth at 6 under.

"I thought, 'Oh, this is another hot day; that's it,'" said Vinijchaitham about her start. "So it's kind of like a flow state. Whenever you hit, it's just good."

Good day at 'Office'

Brian Baumgartner, the actor who portrayed chili-spilling ladies-man Kevin Malone on "The Office," was on site to promote Voltaren, a joint pain relief product. With that commercial message out of the way, the bulk of the time was spent trying, unsuccessfully, to find a sports connection the 53-year-old Atlanta native and Southern California resident has with Boston.

He is a big-time golf player and fan — he has a 7.3 handicap index and co-hosts the "We Need a Fourth" golf podcast — who once played a dream foursome with Billerica native Tom Glavine and the other two Braves pitching legends, Greg Maddux and John Smoltz, so there's that. And he certainly knows Bay State natives and former castmates Steve Carell, John Krasinski, and B.J. Novak well.

Plus, he used to golf with Tim Wakefield, as well as Derek Lowe. Another ex-Red Sox, Kevin Youkilis (husband of Tom Brady's sister, Julie), is a neighbor.

But Boston sports ties? Not so much. Besides the Braves, he's a fan of the Lakers in large part because they didn't beat up the Hawks like the Celtics used to; the Green Bay Packers; plus Georgia football and SMU basketball.

He does, however, have lovely memories of a month-long stay in Boston more than a decade ago for what turned into a "seven- to 10-second" scene in the female-led "Ghostbusters" reboot. Besides becoming a devotee of lobster rolls and sushi during his stay, Baumgartner's opinion of Boston sports fans — expressed comedically, he said — underwent a transformation.

"I had spent my entire adult life rooting specifically against Boston and all of their sports teams because of their well-deserved labeling as being obnoxious and winning too much," said Baumgartner. "I found the people so generous and warm and delightful and so unlike the sort of archetypal. obnoxious sports fan. I went to Fenway and had a fantastic time in an absolute mecca of not just baseball but sports. And as a huge baseball fan, that was a real pleasure of mine."

"And so I have said to many people since then, being there and meeting so many people there and having the opportunity to go to Fenway, my feelings about the fans and the city have softened quite a bit. I had a great, great time. That is all true."

Yin steals attention of fans away from Korda into a fourth-place finish with a standout weekend. Last year, she had a difficult second round (2 over) but still found her way to a tie for 20th.

"I think this course is just one where you have to stay patient and you'll get the opportunities as they come," said the American Solheim Cup pick.

Kim had a similar mind-set heading into Friday's round. It's been a while since her name was on the leaderboard, she said, and a solid round Friday was the breakthrough she had been looking for.

A bogey on No. 4 was the only blip on her scorecard, ending a stretch of 30 consecutive holes at or under par.

Yamashita held the solo lead for much of the afternoon, but two bogeys on her back nine meant she had to settle for a three-way tie for first.

Just behind the leaders are Yin, Jenny Bae, and Morgane Metraux, who had an eagle on No. 2 and carded five birdies Friday — making just her fourth cut of the season.

"I was playing conservative when I had to," the Swiss player said.

Rockland native Megan

Khang played herself into the weekend with a 3-under 69, putting her at 2 under. It was the first time she's made a cut since the KPMG Women's PGA Championship in late June.

"It's been a while since I've been able to play the weekend, and to be here — home state, home sponsor — I'm very happy to make the weekend," said Khang, an FM ambassador. "I was really happy to see some putts go in."

Liu stepping away, but she'll be back

By Kat Cornetta

GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Two years ago, Alysia Liu attended Champs Camp at The Skating Club of Boston in Norwood as the first step in an unexpected comeback.

The annual high-performance training camp held by US Figure Skating was the spot for Liu to return from a two-year break. She made the 2022 Olympics and won a world championship bronze medal, before retiring at the age of 16. After attending college and experiencing a nonskating-focused life, she was set to return.

Taking the ice to her now-famous "MacArthur Park" free skate for the first time, there were nerves — from Liu, her coaches, and those in the audience.

This week, Liu again attended Champs Camp. Introduced as the reigning Olympic champion, she closed the camp's Summer Sizzler exhibition to a standing ovation.

It has been a whirlwind two years for Liu: a comeback to skating, winning a world championship in 2025 at TD Garden, and becoming Olympic champion and a worldwide phenomenon. Her ability to be herself while succeeding in a sport where conformity is typically rewarded enchanted many in the skating community and beyond.

Now Liu is doing things her own way again.

A day before appearing in the first of a series of events as a part of Champs Camp, she announced via her Instagram account that she would be taking the season off from competition.

"I'm gonna take the time to recalibrate, fine-tune things and whatnot," she wrote. "So fear not, I'll be back."

So instead of training with US Figure Skating's elite athletes this week, as she had at a training camp in Colorado Springs earlier in the summer, Liu watched and cheered them on. Instead of running through a tango-themed short program herself, she watched teammates show off new programs and caught up with them during meals.

Liu's decision not to compete

makes sense. The opportunities provided by an Olympic victory are difficult to balance with full-time training. With Liu being the first American women's singles skater to win Olympic gold since 2002, she is in high demand.

"I feel like it would be crazy for her to compete this season, just because of all of the opportunities that are coming her way," said 2018 Olympian Adam Rippon during a live taping of "The Runthrough" podcast at PLAY Boston on Wednesday. "I think sometimes people see her laid-back attitude and it sometimes makes you forget that, of course, she is a professional competitor. I don't think she would ever go to something if she didn't think she would skate well."

Anywhere she goes, the 21-year-old Liu draws a crowd. Thursdays Summer Sizzler was the fifth sold-out exhibition featuring Liu in Boston since her Olympic win in February. Liu's fans came from all over the country to see her skate, as they did in February when she did her first post-Olympic exhibitions at The Skating Club of Boston.

Liu might be off the competitive ice for the next few months, but her impact will still be evident in her teammates' approach and the sport's rebound in popularity.

And when Liu does return next year, she hopes to have the triple Axel — a jump she completed in the first iteration of her career — back in her arsenal. The break will allow her to make such improvements.

"I can really hone in on the blueprints of what I want to do," said Liu.

Makar now highest paid in NHL history

Cale Makar and the Avalanche agreed to a $163.2 million, eight-year extension Friday that will make him the highest-paid player in league history. The terms of the deal were confirmed by his agency, Bartlett Hockey. Makar's extension is set to be the richest in NHL history, surpassing the eight-year, $136 million extension signed by Minnesota forward Kirill Kaprizov last September. Makar's deal runs through the 2034-35 season. With an annual average value of $20.4 million that begins in 2027-28, Makar's deal eclipses that of Sharks star (and Boston University product) Macklin Celebrini, who signed a five-year, $94 million extension in late July that has an $18.8 million AAV. The 27-year-old Makar, who played for UMass from 2017-19, is coming off a season in which he had 20 goals and 59 assists. He finished second to Zach Werenski of Columbus in the Norris Trophy voting, an award that goes to the league's top defenseman. Makar has won the award twice.

WNBA

Fever sink Sun

Caitlin Clark and Kelsey Mitchell each scored 34 points as the Fever got past the visiting Sun, 111-91. The pair scored 30 or more for the fourth time this season, extending their WNBA single-season record for a duo. Clark added 12 assists, marking the fifth time this year she's had a double-double with at least 30 and 10. Mitchell notched her 24th straight 20-point game in the Fever's final game before a three-week break for the FIBA Women's World Cup. Indiana has won seven of nine as Clark, Aliyah Boston, and coach Stephanie White head to Berlin for the tournament. Boston scored 14 points. Diamond Miller finished with 19 points and Nell Angloma had 17 to lead Connecticut.

TENNIS

Rei Sakamoto played his way into the US Open — but only by taking the spot that Kei Nishikori, Japan's greatest men's tennis star, hoped to earn for one last Grand Slam appearance. Sakamoto beat Nishikori, 6-4, 7-6 (7-3), in the final round of qualifying to earn a place in the main draw. The 20-year-old Sakamoto, like many other players from Japan, considers Nishikori his hero. He was 8 years old when Nishikori reached the 2014 US Open final, becoming the first Asian man to get that far in a Grand Slam tournament. Nishikori, 36, has battled injuries in recent years and has said this will be his final season.

AUTO RACING

Chastain in top spot

Ross Chastain took the pole for NASCAR's regular-season finale at Daytona International Speedway. Chastain covered the 2½-mile superspeedway in 48.808 seconds, .05 seconds faster than Chris Buescher in the second and final round of qualifying. Chastain, who has been eliminated from playoff contention, and Buescher will share the front row in the Coke Zero Sugar 400 Saturday night. Buescher is already locked into the 16-car post-season field. Austin Hill qualified third, followed by Ryan Preece, and Riley Herbst.

MISCELLANY

Hearing allowed

A judge has granted a hearing to explore claims that a man wants to recant allegations of sexual abuse years ago by Penn State assistant football coach Jerry Sandusky. Sandusky, 82, has been serving a decades-long prison sentence since he was convicted of 45 counts of sexual abuse in 2012. Eight young men testified about what happened to them as boys. He has repeatedly lost efforts to get a new trial, but Sandusky's lawyers are trying again. A man identified in court documents as R.R. said he was coached extensively by authorities. A hearing has been scheduled for Sept. 8. The Pennsylvania Office of Attorney General said that R.R.'s recantation is "highly suspect."

CRASCO, G. Donald

 Born on December 30, 1942, of Medford, died on July 31, 2026, after a brief hospitalization due to complications from a fall. He is survived by his twin brother, Kenneth; and his sisters, Gael and June; two nephews and two nieces. He was predeceased by his sister, Carol. His condo neighbors and dear friends, Walter and Diane, provided him with assistance and companionship for over 30 years. Don grew up in West Roxbury, attended Boston Latin School and UMASS. He served in the Air Force as a translator during the 1960s. He later worked as a purchasing agent for the Bank of Boston for many years. He was an avid photographer, especially of nature, and a former member of the Newton Camera Club, showing his work locally and serving as a judge for photographic exhibitions. He traveled abroad and created several self-published collections of his photographs. Private services will be held at a later date.

LODEWICK, Richard O.

Born on September 8, 1943, in Brooklyn, NY, Richard Osborne Lodewick passed away peacefully, on Monday, August 24, 2026, at the Boston Medical Center.

Rick was a positive, kind, and generous man with a deep love for his family. He was a loving husband to Susan; and a dedicated father to Deborah, Richard Jr., Thomas and Sarah. He lived as a model for his kids, always present, always positive, always unafraid.

His spirit carried him from the mailroom at IBM to a long and successful career, selling everything from typewriters to New York City skyscrapers. Through hard work, determination, and his natural ability to connect with people, he was an American success story.

Growing up, he was a great runner, competing with the NYAC and running the first NYC marathon. In his later years, he kept active. He especially loved taking the dogs to the beach, going for a swim in the ocean and mapping out a "dunes" workout for his grandkids. Even after a long day, he could often be found in the garden, happily tending to his plants, pulling weeds, and taking pride in keeping everything looking its best.

He loved playing golf, whether competing with friends or enjoying a casual nine holes with his grandkids. As a member of the Ipswich CC for over 35 years, Rick made generations of friends. Even as his health declined, he always found a way to get to the course, play a round and drift around the clubhouse.

But nothing brought him greater joy than cheering on his grandchildren. Whether standing on the sidelines, watching their performances or quietly slipping them a little extra for a good report card, Boppa was always there, with encouragement, pride and, most of all, love.

He is survived by Susan, his loving wife of 61 years; his children, Deborah (Phil) Mullen, Richard (Christine Spadaro) Lodewick, Jr., Thomas (Therese) Lodewick and Sarah (Jon) Guido; his grandchildren, Joanna, Toal, Luca, Chloe, Charlotte, Theo, Quinn, Dylan, Emma; his brothers, Philip and Robert; and sister-in-law, Mary (John Breda) Ambrose. He was preceded in death by his two brothers, Kevin and Peter; and brother-in-law, Bill Ambrose.

There will be no public Service. In lieu of flowers, the family asks that donations be made to The Engraftment Project, <https://engraftmentproject.org/> in recognition of the exceptional care provided by Dr. J. Mark Sloan and his team at BMC, during Rick's battle with cancer.

STEINBERG, Gerald "Jerry"

Gerald Steinberg (Jerry) died peacefully at his home in Brookline, his two children at his side, on August 25.

Born in 1943 to Herman and Rae Steinberg, Jerry grew up on Bergen Avenue in Jersey City, NJ. His parents instilled in him and his two sisters the importance of hard work, and Jerry demonstrated from an early age a desire to be useful to others. As a teenager, his job at a local pharmacy would spark his interest in both medicine and caring for people – the beginnings of what would become a prolific medical career.

Jerry graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Rutgers University and Alpha Omega Alpha from Albert Einstein College of Medicine, with orthopedic training and fellowship at Harvard. He had a distinguished career as an orthopedic surgeon beginning at UMass Medical Center, where Jerry practiced clinically, taught as a professor of orthopedic surgery, and served as chair of the Department of Orthopedics. He later served as Chief Quality Officer before becoming Chief Medical Officer, helping lead the merger of UMass Medical Center and Memorial Hospital, laying the foundation for what became UMass Memorial Medical Center and the broader UMass Memorial health system. In 2005, he joined the Cambridge Health Alliance, where he served in various leadership capacities, spearheading numerous efforts to strengthen the quality and accessibility of health care across Greater Boston.

Throughout his career, Jerry was led by his conviction that everyone, regardless of circumstances, should have quality medical care. He believed that medicine was about people, and that he had to know his patients in order to treat them. He was a deeply caring doctor, whose clinical touch was characterized by a sincere curiosity of others and a gifted knack at conversation.

Jerry's generosity and attentiveness also permeated his role as a beloved father to his two children, Molly and Daniel, and devoted partner to his late wife, Peggy. Jerry and Peggy's marriage was an extraordinary love story and the defining relationship of his life. For more than 45 years, they inspired each other to live joyfully and to the fullest. They cultivated and nurtured meaningful friendships wherever they went, beginning their life together in Framingham, and then in Southborough, where they raised Molly and Daniel. In 2004, they moved to Brookline.

For nearly 50 years, Jerry was a seasonal resident of Martha's Vineyard, where he and Peggy built a second home. There they enjoyed bringing friends and family together, often with dinner parties full of lively conversation and, inevitably, dancing. Among Jerry's other pleasures at the Vineyard were his vigorous walks along the beach, preferably with a friend equally as eager for a robust discussion about politics or other current events.

Peggy's death in 2018 was an enormous loss for Jerry, and his love for her remained a constant presence for the remainder of his life. His relationships with his children and grandchildren remained deep sources of meaning. For Molly and Daniel, and later his daughter-in-law, Emily, he was a steadfast supporter and confidant. He never ceased expressing profound pride in their accomplishments, in their communities, and in the lives they chose to build. He loved being a part of their lives, and effortlessly extended the same interest and generosity to many of their friends, whom he welcomed into his home as a second father.

Jerry was his same big-hearted self but with a bit more goofiness when it came to his five grandsons—Luke, Charlie, Lev, Isaac, and Reuben. He never ceased engaging their curiosity, always indulging their questions, reading with them, and masterfully tricking them into solving math problems. He was an avid fan of Luke's hockey games, and with equal delight watched his younger grandsons learn most anything. He rejoiced in everything they did – any and every new milestone.

Curiosity, service, friendship, and a devotion to family were the enduring threads of Jerry's life. Whether sitting with a patient, leading a hospital, talking with one of his children, or gathered around a dinner table with the people he loved, he brought the same warmth and fundamental conviction: Other people matter, and a meaningful life is one spent caring for others.

Jerry is survived by his children, Molly and Daniel; his daughter-in-law, Emily; his grandsons Luke, Charlie, Lev, Isaac, and Reuben; and his sisters, Barbara Nestler and Shelley Karmiller.

A memorial service will be held at Congregation Kehillath Israel, 384 Harvard Street, Brookline, on Friday, September 25, 2026 at 2pm.

TROTSKY, Ann F. (Pedone)

Age 98, passed away peacefully of natural causes, in her home, on Thursday, August 27, 2026, at Southgate at Shrewsbury, surrounded by the warmth and loving presence of her family. Born in Worcester, Ann was the daughter of James and Rosa (Simone) Pedone; and remained a proud, lifelong resident of Massachusetts.

A woman of effortless natural beauty, grace, and boundless warmth, Ann possessed an extraordinary gift for connecting with people, especially children, whom she adored more than anything in the world. She carried a quiet elegance that needed no adornment; she rarely wore makeup or jewelry, often reminding those around her, "Why do I need a lot of jewelry? I have my four precious diamonds: my children." Known affectionately as "Nina" by those closest to her heart, her home was always immaculate and vibrant, filled with an abundance of good food, laughter, hospitality, and unconditional love.

Ann will be lovingly missed and remembered by her three sons, Steven Trotsky and his wife, Becky of Siesta Key, Florida, John Trotsky and his wife, Katie of Marblehead and Michael Trotsky and his wife, Amy of Belmont; and her daughter, Dr. Lora Trotsky and her husband, Dr. Andrew Kotin of Shrewsbury. She also leaves behind her six cherished grandchildren, Jeffrey, Will and his wife, Victoria, Alyssa, Maxx, Sarah and Benjamin, who brought immense joy to her life and will forever carry her spirit forward.

She was predeceased by her beloved husband of 60 years, David M. Trotsky, who passed away in 2015; as well as her seven siblings: Joseph, Giacomo (Jack), Angelo (Spike), Bartolomeo (Bart), Clementina (Nellie), James (Junie) and Anthony.

Family will gather for a private graveside service at B'nai B'rith Cemetery in Worcester. A Memorial Observance will be announced later. Arrangements are under the care of Miles Funeral Home of HOLDEN, and additional details may be found on their website or by calling the funeral home directly.

In lieu of flowers, memorial donations in Ann's honor may be made to the Dana-Farber Cancer Institute (www.dana-farber.org), the family's favored charity.

Norway’s King Harald V dies at 89; his son becomes King Haakon VIII

By Mark Lewis
ASSOCIATED PRESS

STAVANGER, Norway—King Harald V of Norway, who went into exile in the United States as a child during the Nazi occupation of his homeland and refused a string of potential brides from the European nobility so he could marry his school sweetheart, died Friday. He was 89.

The palace said he died at the National Hospital in Oslo at 6:35 a.m.

Harald was Europe’s oldest monarch. The popular king modernized the royal house but refused to follow in the footsteps of other aging monarchs who have abdicated in recent times. His son automatically became King Haakon VIII.

Like other royal houses in Europe, the Norwegian monarchs serve a largely symbolic role, enjoying celebrity status while real power in the democracy of 5.5 million rests with an elected parliament. Harald was crowned after his British-born father, King Olav V, died in January 1991, and reigned during an oil-and-gas-driven economic boom in his country.

“A whole nation is in mourning and the people of Norway are left with a deep sense of gratitude for a long life in the service of Norway,” Prime Minister Jonas Gahr Store said in a statement. “For more than three decades as monarch, Harald V demonstrated an unwavering faith in the Norwegian people. He helped us to see the best in ourselves — and in one another.”

Harald was born in 1937 in Asker, near Oslo, becoming the first Norwegian prince to be born in the country since King Olav IV in 1370. In the following centuries, Norway didn’t have a king of its own until Harald’s grandfather, Haakon VII, was elected king following the 1905 dissolution of the union between Sweden and Norway.

Harald was 3 years old when the Nazis occupied Norway at the start of World War II. To avoid capture, his mother fled with him and his sisters, Ragnhild and Astrid, first to Sweden and then by boat to the US, while Harald’s father and grandfather went into exile in Britain with Norway’s government.

Haakon’s refusal to go along with German demands garnered respect among his people.

During their time in the US, the Norwegian royals were often guests at the White House. Harald was 6 when he carried out his first official duty, christening new warplanes at a Norwegian air base in Canada.

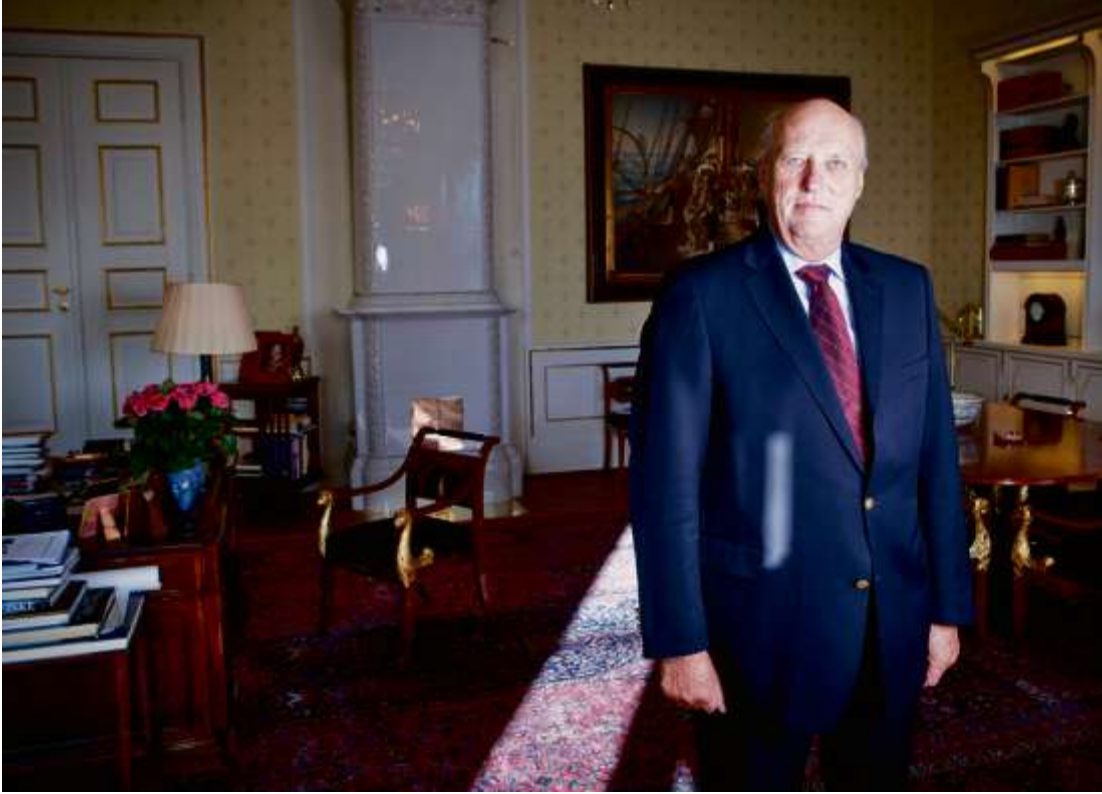

The family was reunited in Norway in June 1945, shortly after the end of the war in Europe. Harald attended public schools, the Norwegian military college, and Oxford University.

Like his father — an Olympic champion sailor in 1928 — Harald loved the sea and sailboats. He represented Norway at several Olympics, and in 1987 he skipped his yacht to gold in the World Championships.

As a young man, Harald was urged to find a bride among Europe’s noblewomen and princesses. For nine years he shunned a series of prospects, holding out until he finally won his father’s permission to marry his school sweetheart, Sonja Haraldsen, the daughter of a successful businessman.

King Olav had feared the marriage would weaken Norway’s still-young monarchy. Instead, Norwegians greeted the Aug. 29, 1968, wedding with jubilation, and later embraced Sonja as their queen. The couple had two children, Haakon and his older sister, Märtha Louise.

The Norwegian Constitution was altered in 1990 to allow the first born, regardless of gender, to take precedence in the line of ter a right-wing extremist, Anders Behring Breivik, killed 77 people in bomb and gun attacks in Norway in 2011.

“I remain convinced that the belief in freedom is stronger than fear. I remain convinced in the belief of an open Norwegian democracy and society. I remain convinced in the belief in our ability to live freely and safely in our own country,” the king said.

In 2016, Harald gave an unexpected and impassioned speech in support of LGBTQ+ equality, refugees, and religious tolerance, saying “Norwegians are girls who love girls, boys who love boys, and girls and succession. However, it was not applied retroactively, meaning that Haakon continued to take precedence over his sister.

When Harald assumed the throne on Jan. 21, 1991, he adopted the same motto his father and grandfather had used: “All for Norway.” He spent the next years trying to modernize the monarchy.

“It has been my experience that the monarchy stands strong,” he once said. “This is not least because my father and grandfather did most things right. That puts me under pressure, but I take it as a challenge.”

Harald won the praise of the country with an emotional speech at a memorial service af-

Len Brown, created ‘Mars Attacks’ cards

By Richard Sandomir
NEW YORK TIMES

Len Brown, who brought a boyish enthusiasm to the Topps Chewing Gum company, writing about players’ achievements for the back of their baseball cards, helping to create the violent “Mars Attacks” card series, and overseeing the development of the “Garbage Pail Kids” stickers, grotesque parodies of Cabbage Patch Kids dolls, died on Aug. 11 in Bee Cave, Texas, near Austin. He was 84.

The cause of death, at a memory care facility, was arteriosclerosis, his wife, Abby Demel Brown, said.

“He was the world’s most mature 12-year-old,” comic artist Art Spiegelman, who worked with Mr. Brown at Topps, said in an interview. “He had a fantastic case of arrested development; he could sense immediately, ‘This is what kids will love.’”

Mr. Brown was 18 when he began working at Topps part time in 1959. For two years, while he was writing biographical notes for the flip sides of baseball cards and handling other projects for the company, he also attended Brooklyn College.

For most of his 40 years at Topps, he specialized in developing products for the non-sports part of the company. He wrote the backs of the 1962 “Civil War News” cards, which depicted battle scenes; the same year, he successfully pitched what became the “Mars Attacks” cards to his boss, Woody Gelman.

Mr. Brown was inspired by the image of a bigheaded creature in “This Island Earth,” a 1955 film about an alien landing, and Wally Wood’s illustration of UFOs landing on Earth for the cover of the EC Comics title Weird Science.

He and Gelman brainstormed about what might happen during a Martian invasion and collaborated on what was written on the back of each card.

“When we started trying to conceptualize the story, we would actually think, ‘OK, what else have the movies done?’” Mr. Brown told The Central New Jersey Home News & Tribune in 1996. “‘Giant insects! Let’s put giant insects on the set! How about shrinking rays? Remember “The Incredible Shrinking Man?” We used every movie cliché and every pulp-cover cliché.”

Mr. Brown “could sense immediately, ‘This is what kids will love,’” said comic artist Art Spiegelman.

The terrifying global invasion played out in 55 vivid cards. But parents’ complaints about the gory incidents that were depicted — a dog being destroyed, for example, as a boy “cried out in horror” — kept them from being distributed nationally.

The series “was withdrawn, returned from wholesale and later became one of Topps’s cult properties, though never a big seller,” Arthur Shorin, a former CEO of the company, wrote in an email.

More than 30 years later, director Tim Burton adapted the card series into the 1996 film “Mars Attacks!,” starring Jack Nicholson as the American president fighting the Martian invasion.

The film opened with a scene of burning cattle being attacked by flying saucers — straight from card No. 22.

Leonard Albert Brown was born Oct. 7, 1941, in New York City to Sarah (Goldsmith) Brown, a bookkeeper, and Jacob Brown, who died when his son was 6.

Len grew up loving comics, rock ‘n’ roll and Topps cards. When he was 13, he read a magazine about Davy Crockett that Gelman had published and contacted him, offering ideas for more magazines. That led to a meeting with Gelman, whom he would come to regard as a father figure.

After graduating from high school, Mr. Brown was hired as Gelman’s assistant at Topps. He eventually rose to become the company’s creative director.

His many projects in the 1960s included helping to create a card set devoted to Soupy Sales, the mischievous TV personality. During the 1970s and ’80s, Mr. Brown was part of the team that created two major sticker series: “Wacky Packages” mocked consumer products, parodying them with names like Cap’n Crud, Jolly Mean Giant, and Ratz Crackers; “Garbage Pail Kids” spoofed Cabbage Patch Kids, the wildly popular, round-faced dolls that came with adoption papers.

Occasionally, Mr. Brown worked outside Topps. In 1965, he freelanced for Tower Comics, collaborating with Wood on several issues of T.H.U.N.D.E.R. Agents, a comic book series that featured superheroes fighting for the United Nations.

A country music fan, he collaborated with Gary Friedrich on two books, “Encyclopedia of Rock ‘n’ Roll” (1970) and “Encyclopedia of Country and Western Music” (1971). He also programmed country-western shows on three radio stations while living in New Jersey beginning in the 1970s. After retiring from Topps in 2000, he moved to Dripping Springs, Texas, near Austin, where he hosted a country music show on the radio.

In addition to his wife, whom he married in 1990, he leaves a daughter, Valarie Brown, and a son, Jonathan, both from his marriage to Dianne Denenberg, which ended in divorce; three stepsons, Todd, Eric, and Harris Demel; and two step-grandsons.

Jaye P. Morgan, 94; jack-of-all-trades entertainer was a pop and TV star

By Joanne Kaufman
NEW YORK TIMES

Jaye P. Morgan, a brash, big-voiced singer who had five top-20 hits over a single year in the mid-1950s — success that led to frequent guest appearances on television series, talk shows, and game shows — but whose on-air high jinks sometimes overshadowed her music career, died Aug. 24 in Longview, Wash. She was 94.

Her death, at a hospital, was confirmed by her nephew Duke M. Spencer, who said the cause was complications from a fall.

Ms. Morgan was in her early 20s when she released in 1953 her version of “Life Is Just a Bowl of Cherries,” a Depression-era song that crooner Rudy Vallee popularized in 1931. Ms. Morgan’s rendition soon hit No. 26 on the Billboard chart.

RCA Victor signed her in 1954, and she scored her biggest hits in 1955: “That’s All I Want From You,” which reached No. 3 on the Billboard chart; “The Longest Walk,” “Danger! Heartbreak Ahead,” “If You Don’t Want My Love,” and “Pepper-Hot Baby.” In 1955, too, she teamed with Perry Como to record the novelty song “Chee Chee-Oo-Chee,” which hit No. 12 on the Billboard chart, and she did a duet cover of “Mutual Admiration Society” with Eddy Arnold in 1956.

Vocally, Ms. Morgan wasn’t in the same league as midcentury female pop giants like Doris Day, Rosemary Clooney, Jo Stafford, and Patti Page, and she never became a durable jukebox sensation. “But while she didn’t have the polish or technique of her bigger rivals — her vibrato could be wobbly and pitchy — what she lacked in style and control she more than made up for in energy and charm,” Marc Myers, a music journalist and writer of the Substack newsletter Jazz-Wax, said in an interview for this obituary earlier this year.

“Nothing about her or her voice was pretentious,” Myers added. “And she had enormous TV presence and an enchanting sunny quality that enabled her to sell the songs she recorded.”

An appearance on Johnny Carson’s “The Tonight Show” in the late 1960s opened up a whole new career for Ms. Morgan as a freewheeling kook on talk shows.

She waxed ribald with Carson through the early 1970s and was a familiar presence — in both senses of the phrase — on “The Merv Griffin Show.”

“Being on ‘The Tonight Show’ for five years is like being on the couch — you finally told him everything,” Ms. Morgan said in an interview with The New York Times in 1981, referring to Carson.

“They wanted me to come on TV talk shows so I would say something that would be bleeped out,” she added. “When home audiences can use their imaginations, they think you said something much worse than you actually did.”

Ms. Morgan left nothing to the imagination when, in 1978 — two years into her stint as a panelist on the antic, anarchic game show and talent competition “The Gong Show” — she flashed her breasts during a taping.

“I felt free to do anything I wanted to a certain extent,” she said in an interview for this obituary earlier this year. “I got caught up in doing the show and in the politics of the time, so I took off my blouse.”

She was dropped from the show, whose producers edited out the incident before the broadcast.

Ms. Morgan insisted that she had no regrets. “I think it helped my career,” she said. “More game shows called wanting me to be on.”

Mary Margaret Morgan was born on Dec. 3, 1931, in Mancos, a town in the southwestern part of Colorado.

Her father, John Morgan, worked odd jobs as a farm hand, was an ornamental plasterworker, and then forged a career as a musician. Her mother, Josephine (Owens) Morgan, managed the household, which included Mary’s sister and four brothers. She also had a half boys who love each other.” He added that many Norwegians have emigrated from Afghanistan, Pakistan, Poland, and other countries and that they “believe in God, Allah, the universe, and nothing.”

The public speech extolled the diversity of the Scandinavian nation and was viewed on social media by millions.

Scandal and serious allegations have hung over the Norwegian royal family this year. Harald’s daughter-in-law, Crown Princess Mette-Marit, faced renewed scrutiny over her connections with the late sex offender Jeffrey Epstein. That raised questions over her judgment, though she is not accused of any wrongdoing. Mette-Marit apologized for the situation she put the royal family in, part of a broader apology for all those she had “disappointed.”

At around the same time, her eldest son, Marius Borg Hoiby, was convicted of rape in a high-profile trial and sentenced to four years in prison. Hoiby, Mette-Marit’s son from a previous relationship before she met Haakon, has no royal titles or official duties.

In 2022, Harald’s daughter Märtha Louise gave up royal duties after raising eyebrows by saying she could communicate with angels and becoming engaged to an American man who identifies as a shaman. They married two years later.

In January 2024, after the abdication of Denmark’s Queen Margrethe — his second cousin — Harald said that he stood by the oath he made when ascending the throne: “It lasts for life.”

However, he was hospitalized twice on foreign trips after that, including during a 2024 vacation in Malaysia when he was fitted with a pacemaker and during a February 2026 holiday on the Spanish island of Tenerife when he had a skin infection.

brother and half sister from her father’s two previous marriages.

The spotlight found her early. As a toddler, she was presented as the newest member of the Morgan Family, a traveling country-western act that comprised her parents and most of her siblings. The group frequently performed on the radio.

“I was 3 when I knew I could sing,” Ms. Morgan recalled in the interview for this obituary. “My dad would have me stand in front of him and sing ‘Daddy’s Little Girl’ and other songs that were popular at the time. I couldn’t read yet, but someone would sing the lyrics to me, and I learned them quickly.”

Mary was 13 when her father died; the family troupe disbanded. She attended high school in the Los Angeles area and started singing professionally again. A year after graduating, she began appearing as Jaye P. with an orchestra led by Frank DeVol, a noted arranger and composer.

“My name was Mary Morgan, and at the time there were a lot of singers with the last name ‘Morgan,’” she said. (Their ranks included Jane Morgan and Marion Morgan.) It was DeVol who came up with Jaye P., a play on the name of the Gilded Age financier J.P. Morgan. “Because of it, people thought I knew a lot about money, or they wanted to borrow money from me,” Ms. Morgan said jokingly in the interview for this obituary.

Ms. Morgan was married and divorced three times. Her first marriage, in 1954, to Michael Baiano, an actor, ended in divorce the following year. Soon after, she had a short-lived marriage to Chuck Kelly, a singer. Her final marriage was to Artie Kane, a pianist and conductor.

Her son, Paul Kane, died in 2020. She had no immediate survivors.

For all the attention her curious name attracted, Ms. Morgan later reconsidered her willingness to go along with the gambit.

“We thought it would be fun, but it confused a lot of people,” she said. “I didn’t want to be Mary Morgan, but we could have thought of a much better name than Jaye P.”

Failed heart disease study sends shockwaves

By Andrew Joseph
STAT
AstraZeneca on Friday detailed the surprise failure of a closely watched heart disease clinical trial, laying out how its experimental drug offered no additional benefits for patients who were largely already on another type of medicine — the latest twist in a multibillion-dollar market.

The study indicated that patients with a progressive condition known as ATTR-CM who received AstraZeneca's drug — what's called a silencer — saw no improvements if they were already taking another type of drug called a stabilizer, an effect so powerful that it tanked the whole Phase 3 study. Most participants were on a stabilizer at the outset of the trial.

The trial's miss has had implications not just for AstraZeneca and its development partner Ionis Pharmaceuticals, but for other companies that market ATTR-CM drugs, including Cambridge-based Alnylam Pharmaceuticals, which sells another silencer, and BridgeBio, the maker of a new stabilizer. Analysts have said the study's outcome bolstered the case that stabilizers, which are oral drugs, were perhaps superior to injectable silencers.
AstraZeneca and Ionis announced the failure of the CARDIO-TTTransform trial last month, saying that their drug, called Wainua, didn't outperform a placebo in reducing cardiovascular deaths or emergencies among patients overall. The full data were presented Friday at the European Society of Cardiology's annual meeting in Munich and published in the New England Journal of Medicine.

“It is disappointing,” said Mina Makar, a senior vice president at AstraZeneca focused on the company's cardiovascular work. The hope had been that a silencer could protect patients whose disease continued to worsen even while on a stabilizer, he said.

“We really felt we could help these patients, because they need something more than a stabilizer alone,” he said.
AstraZeneca and Ionis have highlighted that Wainua, also called eplontersen, did outperform placebo among a subgroup of patients who started the study drug without being on a stabilizer, cutting the risk of cardiovascular death or events by 29 percent. Investigators will present more detailed results from this monotherapy group at the ESC conference on Sunday.

Defense contractor says it's on 'the brink'

CEO warns Hegseth of firm's possible collapse

By Camilo Fonseca
GLOBE STAFF
A Boston-based defense firm has warned it may file for bankruptcy within the next two months because of the Pentagon's decision to cut short a billion-dollar hardware contract earlier this year.

Noble Supply & Logistics, a material and equipment vendor headquartered in the Seaport, said in a letter to Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth that the company is on “the brink of collapse,” because of a series of “decisions and delays” caused by the Pentagon's procurement arm.

“There is a meaningful probability that within the next 60 days, Noble Supply & Logistics will have no alternative but to file for bankruptcy protection,” Thomas Noble, the company's chairman and CEO, wrote in the Aug. 19 letter.

The company acts as a middleman between individual manufacturers and government agencies, offering a supply chain for products ranging from tactical gear to hydraulics and electrical equipment, according to its website.

It would be a “bureaucratic failure” for the company to go under, the letter said.

Last week, the company told state regulators that it expected to lay off 59 employees at its Seaport headquarters by Oct. 9. In a notice required under federal law, Noble said it would “have to permanently close” its Boston office “as a result of recent financial circumstances.”

On Wednesday, however, a company spokesperson said Noble has not announced any specific plans related to the closing of the Boston office, adding that it is currently searching for alternative financing.

Noble is pursuing a claim of approximately $100 million against the Defense Logistics Agency, a division of the Department of Defense, stemming from the “termination of a critical weapons support contract,” the spokesperson said.

“DLA's actions impact not only Noble, but a multitude of small businesses across America,” the spokesperson said.

The Defense Logistics Agency on Wednesday deferred comment to the Pentagon, which did not return a request for comment.

Noble is formally classified as a small business under federal procurement guidelines. But its operations involve the distribution of products from thousands of manufacturers, including gear, machinery, and maintenance supplies.

The company also maintains offices in Chesapeake and Harrisonburg, Va., Lexington Park, Md., as well as in Kazakhstan and near military bases in Germany and on Okinawa, Japan.

In 2022, the company was awarded a $1.2 billion contract for industrial hardware and abrasives — including screws, bolts, fasteners, coils, and other products — to be used in “multiple weapon systems.” The contract, initially set over a 10-year period, was shortened to less than four, according to the company's letter.

Noble continued purchasing inventory to meet its commitments under the contract, encouraged by the Defense Logistics Agency's proposal of a one-year extension in October, according to the letter.

But earlier this year, the Pentagon allegedly reversed course, said it would not exercise the extension, and imposed a “hard stop” on the program just three months later in June.

That, according to the letter, left Noble with approximately $72 million in inventory purchases and commitments, which the company said it had only purchased because of the Pentagon's indications of a contract extension.

In the letter, Thomas Noble wrote that the company is pursuing a claim under the Contract Disputes Act, but said “that process takes time and resources the company no longer has.”

The company's commitment to the hardware contract has impaired its ability to pay suppliers involved in other Pentagon programs, he added.

Noble urged the Pentagon to establish clear guidelines that would honor commitments to terminated contracts, “including obligations created when small businesses invest in inventory and capacity at the Government's direction.”

Those guidelines would include binding deadlines for making decisions on contract termination and inventory buybacks, as well as accountability “for decisions left unmade, not just decisions made incorrectly.”

He said the “underlying issue” goes beyond Noble's predicament: if the Pentagon remains free to alter existing supply contracts without absorbing the costs, then “other small businesses will understandably hesitate to make similar investments.”

Barbara Lynch, who recently hosted private dinners at her Manchester-by-the-Sea studio, owes nearly $1 million in personal property taxes.

‘What can you do with me? Arrest me?’

By Dana Gerber
GLOBE STAFF
Barbara Lynch, the acclaimed chef whose Boston restaurant empire collapsed under the weight of toxic workplace allegations, has had her bank accounts frozen for failing to pay taxes she owes to the city of Boston, according to a Friday court filing.
Seeking to recoup nearly $1 million in personal property taxes — which can be assessed on things like equipment and machinery — plus interest, the city asked a judge in Suffolk Superior Court to seize Lynch's accounts at eight different banks. The judge sided with the city and issued a temporary restraining order, finding that the city “has demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits,” and “that it faces a substantial risk of irreparable harm if the requested relief is not granted.”
The preliminary judgment prohibits Lynch from removing or transferring funds, “or otherwise encumbering” her accounts at Eastern Bank, Bank of America, Santander Bank, Citizens Bank, Commerce Bank, TD Bank, Winchester Savings Bank, and Winchester Co-Operative Bank.

The city sued Lynch in 2024 for failing to pay personal property taxes across her seven Boston restaurants, all of which have since shuttered. Earlier this summer, the city won that lawsuit. Lynch has made no payments toward the sum she owes, which has continued to grow as interest has accrued, according to court documents.
In an interview with the Globe Friday afternoon, Lynch said the city would find nowhere close to the amount she owes in her bank accounts.
“There's no money to be had. If they freeze my accounts, great,” she said. “$2,000 is what I have left. I mean, I'm literally living on Social Security right now.”

The city's request was filed ex parte, meaning Lynch was not involved in the initial hearing. The city made it because it was “certain that notification” of the motion would cause Lynch “to remove all funds” in the accounts, “as she has been less than cooperative” during the proceedings and has made no effort to pay down her balance.
Lynch said she only learned of the freeze when she heard about it from a Globe reporter.
“I just give up. I'm giving up. I've fought too many battles. I can't fight this one,” she said, adding that she can't afford lawyers. “I don't know what they're gonna do with me. What can you do with me? Arrest me?”

The news, first reported by website Universal Hub, comes amid the start of a culinary comeback for Lynch, who has recently hosted private dinners at her studio in Manchester-by-the-Sea, and plans to soon launch cooking trips and a cookbook subscription series. The James Beard Award-winning chef was once at the vanguard of the Boston food scene, with restaurants including No. 9 Park, Menton, and B&G Oysters.
But in 2023, an article in the Globe found that empire belied a darker reality, with many employees claiming inappropriate behavior by Lynch, accusations she denied. She subsequently closed all of her restaurants, citing, in part, the financial struggle of the post-pandemic restaurant industry.
“We had no idea when we were closing the restaurants that we were going to be sued for 900 — what is

Fed chief seeks to calm concerns about US inflation

By Colby Smith
NEW YORK TIMES
JACKSON, Wyo. — Kevin Warsh, the chair of the Federal Reserve, sought to alleviate concerns about his commitment to taming elevated inflation after a tumultuous few weeks for the US government bond market, suggesting in a closely-watched speech that the central bank will have “work to do” if price pressures do not ease in a timely fashion.
Warsh, delivering his first address to the world's leading economic policymakers at the Fed's annual conference in Jackson, Wyo., affirmed that the central bank is chiefly focusing on getting inflation down after half a decade of it overshooting the Fed's 2 percent target.
The Fed would not waver on that goal, Warsh said, although he stopped short of saying whether the current moment required higher interest rates.
“The responsibility for 65 months of sustained, elevated inflation sits squarely with the central bank — and that is where it belongs,” he said in prepared remarks.

“Here is my standard: We must be confident that underlying inflation is moving to our objective, clearly and at sufficient speed,” Warsh added. “Otherwise, we have work to do.”
Warsh made clear that adjustments to the Fed's overnight rate, which currently stands at 3.5 percent to 3.75 percent, were the “predominant tool” to achieve both low, stable prices and a healthy labor market.
“Price stability is not self-executing,” Warsh said.
Financial markets were relatively stable in the wake of Warsh's speech. Two-year Treasury yields, which are sensitive to changes in interest rate expectations, rose to their highest level in roughly a month. Stocks, which typically slide in response to higher interest rates, were flat. Investors now see nearly even odds that the Fed will raise rates by a quarter of a percentage point at its next gathering in September.

The comments are Warsh's most extensive to date about the economy since taking over the Fed's top job in May amid a confluence of risks. They range from a protracted Iran war that has worsened the trajectory of inflation to rising Treasury yields that prompted surprise interventions recently from Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent.
Warsh struck an upbeat tone about the prospects of “substantially higher growth,” saying its potential was “on the rise.” He cited the “ever-expanding pools of capital” that are being deployed to expand artificial intelligence abilities.
Warsh also noted pockets of weakness, in sectors like housing and agriculture, but concluded that he would be “hard pressed to describe broad financial conditions as restrictive.”
Perhaps most importantly, he seemed to downplay recent progress in inflation, after two months that showed slightly less acute price pressures. “They do not tell me that underlying trends have meaningfully improved,” he said of inflation data this summer. Moreover, he suggested that with the labor market “quite stable” and inflation running above target, “the Fed's predominant focus right now should be on prices.”

“If you've just indicated your predominate concern is inflation that's too high, then your statement about financial conditions gives a pretty clear indication of which way you're leaning — a greater likelihood the next move will be a hike rather than a cut,” said David Wilcox, a senior fellow at the Peterson Institute for International Economics and a former leader of the Fed's research and statistics division.
“All that is a pretty stark turn from his July press conference,” added Wilcox, who is also the director of US economic research at Bloomberg Economics.

Alnylam eyes other firm's drug failure monotherapy group meant AstraZeneca might still submit Wainua to regulators, Makar stressed that the study failed overall. He added: “We’re still working through the data and making decisions about what we do with the monotherapy data.”

In its positive pivotal trial, called HELIOS-B, Alnylam’s ATTR-CM silencer Amvuttra cut the risk of cardiovascular death and events by 33 percent and 28 percent, respectively.

AstraZeneca has said the misstep with Wainua has not jeopardized its $80 billion revenue target for 2030.

ATTR-CM, also called transthyretin-mediated amyloid cardiomyopathy, is a progressive heart disease that occurs when a protein known as TTR becomes misfolded, building up in heart muscles. The heart then can’t pump blood as well, ultimately leading to fatal heart failure without treatment. The condition is caused by a mutation or by aging.

Silencers are designed to tamp down the production of TTR, while stabilizers aim to prevent the protein from misfolding. BridgeBio’s stabilizer Attruby was approved in late 2024, while Pfizer sells an older stabilizer most commonly known as Vyndamax.

While ATTR-CM was once considered rare, it’s now thought to affect 400,000 to half a million people globally, a patient population large enough to have created a spirited competition among pharma companies, particularly in the lucrative first-line setting. Wainua is already approved to treat a related nerve condition called ATTR-PN, but ATTR-CM is a much larger market.

The flop of AstraZeneca’s silencer might have been thought to be a boon for Alnylam, as it took a potential rival out of the race. Instead, it seemed to stoke questions about the power of silencers broadly, raising the prospect that for patients whose disease isn’t controlled with a stabilizer alone, adding a silencer may not do anything.

Those concerns have weighed on Alnylam’s share price, as have Amvuttra sales, which haven’t met expectations following an initially strong launch last year. The debate has also extended to the company’s next-generation medicine nudesiran that it’s developing to succeed Amvuttra. Alnylam has reiterated its confidence in the drug, which is in a Phase 3 study, saying it is a more powerful silencer.

In the new study, there were 74 cardiovascular deaths and 307 cardiovascular events in 210 patients who received Wainua, a monthly injection. In the placebo group, there were 70 related deaths and 322 events in 231 patients. There was a nominal risk reduction of 11 percent favoring the Wainua arm, but the finding was far from statistically significant.

Lynch’s bank accounts frozen in city lawsuit

it? $900,000 or something?” she said Friday.

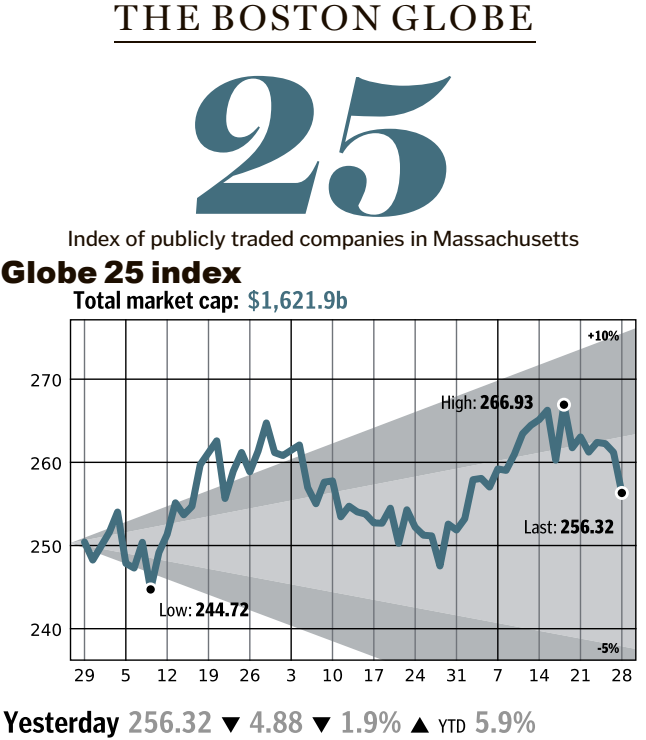

“Quite frankly, I just don’t understand it,” she said. “Where does the tax money go? Where does that $900,000 go to that I owe for property, for my equipment that I don’t even own anymore?”

In its filings, the city said it believed “there are sufficient funds” in her accounts to “partially or fully satisfy the amount due,” and said Lynch “purposefully has either shielded assets or dissipated assets.” It pointed to recent influxes of cash it said Lynch had received, including from the nearly $2 million sale of her Gloucester home in 2024 and a corresponding estate sale, the sale of a liquor license and restaurant furniture, and the recent $375-per-ticket dinners she has hosted, according to filings.

The city also alleged Lynch “was found to have comingled personal funds and business funds and thus was found to have violated the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act.”

A hearing in the case is scheduled for Sept. 10, according to the court docket.

Stocks end week with small dip

NEW YORK — The bond market swung Friday as investors built bets that the Federal Reserve may hike interest rates soon to get the nation’s high inflation under control. US stocks, meanwhile, dipped but not by much after economists said a speech by Chairman Kevin Warsh helped strengthen faith that the Fed will do what’s needed to bring inflation down, even if it causes pain for the economy in the short term. The S&P 500 fell 0.2% after flipping between modest gains and losses through the morning. The Dow Jones Industrial Average dipped 9 points, or less than 0.1%, and the Nasdaq composite slipped 0.5%. The reaction was stronger in the bond market. Worries had grown that his tough talk about getting inflation down to the Fed’s 2% target may be just that, unless the Fed backs it up with action. The Fed could hike short-term interest rates to get inflation under control, but it could also feel deterred from doing so because that would slow the economy and hurt prices for investments. And President Donald Trump, who appointed Warsh, has been vocal about wanting interest rates to be lower rather than higher.

Higher ed is at a turning point.

HOROSCOPES

HAPPY BIRTHDAY for Saturday, Aug. 29, 2026: You're clever, independent, wise, and often romantically involved with someone. You are always inquisitive. This is a slower paced year. Take time to rejuvenate your energy and your outlook. Focus on business and personal relationships, and make sure you hang out with people who are kind, helpful, and have your back.

ARIES (March 21-April 19)

Today you feel a strong need to relate to others. Your emotions are heightened with the Moon in your sign, which can make things a little tricky. You can be emotionally giving, but also emotionally demanding. Tonight: You win!

TAURUS (April 20-May 20) You might be tempted to withdraw from the demands of people and duties around you because you want to avoid something. Probably, you don't feel like socializing. You might want to explore the mystical side of your world. (You need some privacy.) Tonight: Enjoy time alone.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20)

Today your contact with friends and members of groups is important. This is why you might feel more protective and supportive to someone. You might even feel a bit jealous if this person pays more attention to someone else. Tonight: You're popular.

CANCER (June 21-July 22) You're high-viz today, which means people notice you more than usual. Keep this in mind in case you're tempted to have a public argument with a loved one. (Hissing in loud whispers in an elevator?) Be aware that people seem to know details about your private life today. Tonight: You're admired.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22) You want to shake things up today. You want some adventure! You need a change of scenery. Therefore, change your daily routine. Go someplace you've never been before. This could be a minor thing, but at least it's fresh and new! This is what you hunger for. Tonight: Explore and learn.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22) Because your emotional experiences are more intense than usual, this might be reflected in your encounters with others. Perhaps it's because you feel possessive about something, or it could be related to memories from your past. You might want something that someone else has. Tonight: Check your finances.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22) Your attention will likely turn to your most personal relationships because you feel the need to express your feelings today. Because of this, if you have conflict with a spouse, partner, or close friend, it will be more emotional. Guard against knee-jerk reactions. Tonight: Listen and cooperate.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21) You might have to put your own emotional considerations second to those of someone else today. Don't worry; you're not being a martyr. This is just what's happening. Meanwhile, take a moment to focus on your health and what you might do to improve your it. Ideas? Tonight: Get better organized.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21) This is a lovely day for romance, socializing, enjoying a vacation, and expanding your world through the theater, movies, and the entertainment world. You also might feel protective and nurturing to children or a romantic partner. Tonight: Socialize!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19) This is the perfect day to retire by yourself somewhere and enjoy your own privacy. Make an effort to do this, even if for only a short time. Relax. Make some food that is a guilty pleasure. Read a book; watch TV; indulge yourself. You need it. Give yourself a mental health break. Tonight: Relax.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18) Today you feel a strong need to talk to others because you have something you want to say. The key is you have to find someone who is willing to listen to you, genuinely and sincerely. In other words, you don't want to simply chat with someone about something inconsequential. Tonight: Discussions.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20) It's easy to identify with your sessions today, which is why you might feel more possessive than usual about something. For example, perhaps you don't want to lend something to someone. Check the Moon Alert before spending money today. Tonight: Check your belongings.

Simple Saturday columns focus on basic technique and logical thinking.

"I took time to explain the word 'bargain' to my daughter, and she said it meant a great deal to her." — graffiti

Beware of bargains at the bridge table. In today's deal, West led the deuce of spades against 3NT, dummy followed with the three, East played the four and declarer bought the first trick for the bargain price of a seven. South next led the queen of hearts, winning, and a heart to dummy's jack. East took the king and led a club.

South won and had to reach dummy twice to set up and then cash the long hearts. He led the nine of spades, planning to play dummy's jack, but West alertly put up the queen. Then dummy's second entry vanished, and South couldn't use the hearts and won only eight tricks.

South needed to pay a fair price for the first trick: He must win with the king. He can finesse with the jack later to get a necessary second entry to dummy and finish with an overtrick.

DAILY QUESTION You hold: ♠ 6 5 4 ♥ A K 7 4 ♦ 9 8 ♣ Q 10 8 2. Your partner opens one diamond. The next player bids one spade. What do you say?

ANSWER: Without the overcall, you would have responded one heart, but you have too few hearts and too few points to bid two hearts. Your best call is a negative double, which by agreement shows enough strength to respond, with a heart suit plus diamond tolerance or clubs. If your partner bids two hearts next, pass.
