Arch harm to historic sites is conceded

But the work must go on despite ‘adverse effects,’ federal officials say

BY DAN DIAMOND

Federal officials acknowledge that President Donald Trump’s planned triumphal arch will unavoidably harm historic sites if built as planned, but they say the project must move forward, according to a National Park Service document and emails obtained by The Washington Post.

Trump’s 250-foot-tall proposed arch would be built in Memorial Circle, a traffic roundabout tucked inside Washington’s boundaries near Arlington National Cemetery. Historic preservationists, veterans groups and others have called on the administration to shrink the monument’s planned size or build it elsewhere, warning that the towering structure would overshadow the cemetery, interrupt the solemn corridor that was intended between the cemetery and the Lincoln Memorial, and create other disruptions.

National Park Service officials agree that the arch would adversely affect the cemetery, the Lincoln Memorial and several dozen other historic sites.

The “adverse effects cannot be fully avoided,” Park Service officials wrote in a document circulated Tuesday and obtained by The Washington Post. But, they said, the project cannot be constructed somewhere else because “the proposed location at Memorial Circle is central to the undertaking,” according to the NPS document.

Trump: Kennedy Center could be ‘ripped down’

Says his administration deserves to be recognized at venue

BY JONATHAN EDWARDS AND JADE TRAN

President Donald Trump said Wednesday that his administration deserves to have its name recognized at the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts in exchange for rescuing the financially troubled institution, warning that without his intervention the venue will eventually close and be “ripped down.”

“For us as an administration to want to do that, I think the Trump administration should be recognized,” Trump told reporters while visiting North Carolina to campaign for the Republican Senate nominee. The president said the center would require years of financial support even after a roughly $250 million renovation.

“Frankly, if we don’t do that, it’s going to close,” he said. “It’ll end up being ripped down.”

Trump’s remarks sharpened his position that saving the Kennedy Center hinges on putting his name on the building, a day after he threatened to block its renovation unless the courts allow the institution to do just that.

On Wednesday, the center remained closed as a federal judge ordered officials to respond to an emergency motion challenging the shutdown.

Rep. Joyce Beatty (D-Ohio), a Kennedy Center trustee who has repeatedly challenged Trump’s transformation of the institution in court, filed an emergency motion Wednesday arguing that center officials appeared to be violating U.S. District Judge Christopher Cooper’s order by closing the building without his approval.

“It seems Defendants may be violating the ‘clear and unambiguous order of the Court,’” lawyers Nathaniel Zelinsky and Norm Eisen wrote.

Hours later, Cooper ordered center officials to explain the closure by 10 a.m. Thursday. He said he would hold a hearing if

Republicans on trail ignore Trump’s advice

President suggested they act like he’s on ballot and promise $5,000 payouts

BY CLARA ENCE MORSE, GREGORY S. SCHNEIDER AND THEODORIC MEYER

President Donald Trump handed Republicans what he said was a surefire formula for winning the midterm elections this fall: Act as if Trump is on the ballot and promise $5,000 payouts to every citizen.

A week after the Republican midterm convention where Trump delivered his advice, most GOP congressional candidates are ignoring it, a Washington Post analysis of more than a million social media posts by politicians found.

Republican candidates are sticking to their own messages, not Trump’s, as they navigate an increasingly difficult political landscape marked by high consumer prices, a protracted war in Iran and a president whose own approval rating has stayed stubbornly low, the analysis shows.

Trump had proposed the unprecedented midterm convention as a way to rally the party’s supporters, who have been unenthusiastic about voting, according to polls. The Post analysis suggests Republican candidates, for the most part, have not attempted to harness whatever direction came out of the two-day convention in Dallas.

At the start of the year, Republican politicians mentioned Trump or the MAGA movement in about 1 in 6 of their online posts or podcasts. Republican National Convention (RNC) speakers — a group of about 40 pro-Trump politicians who addressed the midterm convention — mentioned him much more often over that same period, in about a fifth of their posts, The Post analysis found.

Those figures have dropped by nearly half as the year has played out. Some Republican candidates have removed mentions of Trump from their websites, while candidates in many competitive races declined to attend the convention.

And the candidates still talking substantially about Trump after the convention are Democrats, who are mentioning him in about 20 percent of their posts so far this week.

Trump’s marquee proposal — a pledge to send $5,000 payments to American citizens if Republicans keep their majorities in Congress — attracted widespread attention during and after he announced it in his Sept. 10 speech from the convention floor.

But Democrats were more likely than Republicans to discuss the plan, with most attacking it as an unfulfillable, corrupt promise.

U.S. measles crisis bewailed at Hill hearing

GOP senator says surge will be White House’s ‘terrible legacy’

BY RACHEL ROUBEIN

Sen. Bill Cassidy (R-Louisiana) on Wednesday said the nation’s worst measles outbreak in the United States in 35 years is “going to be a terrible legacy for this administration,” citing recent deaths in Pennsylvania.

“Misinformation and misguided policies are leaving children and adults unprotected against disease that we know how to prevent,” Cassidy, a physician and chair of the Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee, said at the outset of a hearing for three key administration nominees.

The United States this year has reported the most measles cases since 1991, surpassing last year’s total with months left to go. Pennsylvania state health officials said Tuesday that the state has recorded a total of four measles-associated deaths for the year.

Last month, President Donald Trump launched his most significant attempt yet to overhaul childhood vaccinations, issuing an executive order calling for cutting the number of recommended childhood shots and breaking up the combined measles, mumps and rubella (MMR) vaccine into three separate doses.

“It deeply concerns me to see politicians giving medical advice which has zero scientific backing. Scaring mothers into delaying or even altogether skipping their child’s vaccine is wrong,

Fed raises interest rates

QUARTER-POINT HIKE TO BATTLE INFLATION

President takes to social media to call for cuts

BY STEVE THOMPSON

The Federal Reserve raised interest rates by a quarter point on Wednesday, its first increase in more than three years, as persistently high oil prices from the Iran conflict send inflation rippling through the economy.

Even as President Donald Trump continued on Wednesday to call on the Fed to lower rates, Fed officials unanimously chose to increase its benchmark rate, hiking the cost of borrowing among banks, which will increase what millions of households and businesses pay to borrow, including credit cards and other loans.

“Economic activity is expanding at a solid pace,” Fed policymakers said in a statement. “While uncertainty remains elevated owing, in part, to geopolitical developments, domestic spending has been resilient.”

Productivity growth and capital investment have been strong, and the unemployment rate has held steady, while inflation remains high, the Fed said.

After the Fed meeting, Trump took to social media to call for

Damage to key pipeline could exacerbate pressures on flow of oil

BY EVAN HALPER, RACHEL CHASON AND JOYCE SOHYUN LEE

The effects of the U.S.-led war on Iran are about to intensify in the form of huge jumps the prices of gasoline and diesel, analysts predict. And despite the Trump administration’s assurances, a new and potentially even more economically damaging phase of the war may be about to begin.

Damage inflicted on Saudi Arabia’s East-West pipeline last week, along with continuing strikes on oil infrastructure and contested control over a key waterway, threaten to elevate what had been a shipping crisis into a broader disruption of oil.

The 745-mile pipeline is Saudi Arabia’s principal overland alternative to the Strait of Hormuz, linking eastern oil fields to Red Sea export terminals.

U.S. Energy Secretary Chris Wright said Tuesday that the pipeline would be operational again in a matter of days, and the White House has touted renewed tanker traffic through the Strait of Hormuz.

Can Ohio’s Sherrod Brown win back working-class voters?

The state is crucial to Democrats’ drive to retake the Senate

BY THEODORIC MEYER AND KAREN TUMULTY

MANSFIELD, OHIO — Former Democratic senator Sherrod Brown spent 50 years forging a bond with Ohio’s working-class voters, starting in the 1970s as a young state lawmaker who often dropped by the union halls in this small industrial city he represented to talk with workers.

Brown won reelection to the Senate during President Donald Trump’s first term even as Ohio started turning redder — but he lost his seat in 2024 with Trump on the ballot, as many blue-collar voters embraced Trump and abandoned Brown and his party.

Now, Brown, 73, is trying to return to Washington in a race that is testing whether he can win back some of the working-class voters he lost in places like Mansfield — and that could determine whether Democrats retake control of the chamber.

Sen. Jon Husted (R-Ohio), whom Brown is challenging, is also trying to win over those voters, criticizing Brown as an ineffective fighter for the working class whose decades in office did little to help them.

A handful of labor unions that supported Brown in the past have endorsed Husted this year. But most union leaders who have endorsed are sticking with Brown, and there are tentative signs that he could run stronger with union members than he did in 2024.

The Trump shirts that many union members sported at work two years ago have largely disappeared, local labor leaders say. Workers who voted Republican in part because of frustration with the rising cost of living in 2024 remain upset. And some union workers who voted for Bernie Moreno, the Republican who defeated Brown, have told labor leaders that they plan to back Brown this year.

Most public polling in recent months has found Brown leading Husted. A Fox News poll conducted last month found Brown leading Husted 64 percent to 33 percent with voters in union households — a much bigger advantage than Brown’s margin with those voters in 2024, according to AP VoteCast and network exit polling. Union households made up about 20 percent of the electorate in Ohio two years ago, according to AP VoteCast.

“The mood of the electorate has shifted dramatically in Ohio,” said Tim Burga, the president of the Ohio AFL-CIO.

Ohio is crucial to Democrats’ drive to retake the Senate in November’s midterm elections. Democrats need to pick up four seats to recapture the Senate majority, including at least two in states such as Ohio that Trump carried by double-digit margins two years ago.

Brown lost reelection by less than four percentage points in 2024, running more than seven points ahead of Kamala Harris in Ohio. He won union households but by a narrower margin than he did in 2018, according to AP VoteCast and exit polls.

Union members are a subset of a larger group of working-class voters who have shifted toward the Republican Party in the Trump era. Brown also lost with voters without bachelor’s degrees — another proxy for the working class — in 2024 after winning them six years earlier.

Brown says he has also sensed a shift this year among union voters. In an interview this month, he said union leaders seemed to be talking with their members about the race more than they did in 2024. Ohioans did not vote for war with Iran or skyrocketing gas prices, he said. “They’re a much more receptive audience,” Brown said. “People are upset for very good reason at what’s happened, and they look at somebody like me and they know I’ve been making these fights. It’s not [like] I’m a late convert to fighting for workers.”

Ron Adkins, the president of Lorain County AFL-CIO Federation of Labor, said he expected a significant number of his members who supported Moreno in 2024 to vote for Brown, driven by economic frustrations.

“I’m seeing a lot of buyer’s remorse,” Adkins said. “So I think Sherrod’s going to win this.”

A doctor’s son

Brown is not a son of the working class. He grew up in Mansfield, where his father was a doctor and his mother was active in the local Democratic Party. But he has spoken often about going to school with the children of workers at Mansfield’s industrial powerhouses: Westinghouse and General Motors, Mansfield Tire and Rubber Company and Tappan Stove.

Brown left for Yale but returned to Mansfield after graduating and ran for state representative in 1974, winning his seat days before his 22nd birthday. By the time he won, he has said, the jobs that sustained his classmates’ parents had been disappearing for years. He spent hours at the United Steelworkers union hall in Mansfield, “listening to workers talk about their dreams,” as he put it in a Senate floor speech in 2018.

Kenneth Cooper, the international president of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, who grew up in the same town, said he thought Brown’s experience watching “really good people suffering” in Mansfield shaped Brown’s fierce advocacy for unions.

“I really believe that a lot of Sherrod’s values came from seeing that happen in that town,” Cooper said.

Brown won a House seat in 1992 and became an outspoken critic of the North American Free Trade Agreement, writing a book titled “Myths of Free Trade: Why American Trade Policy Has Failed.” In the Senate, he helped pass legislation to shore up union pension plans and to allow retirees who receive state or local pensions to get their full Social Security benefits. He supported Trump’s tariffs on imported steel during his first term, though he has criticized the more sweeping tariffs that Trump imposed in his second term as “nonsensical.”

Brown’s record earned the loyalty of Ohio labor leaders. But he could not overcome the flight of blue-collar voters — including many in unions — away from Democrats as they voted for Trump. He even lost Mansfield in 2024 after carrying the city during his previous Senate campaigns.

After the election, Brown pointed to working-class voters’ defections as the reason he lost.

“Workers have slowly migrated out of the Democratic Party,” he told The Washington Post at the time.

‘Voters in Ohio have figured him out’

Husted, 59, argues that Brown lost because he has failed to improve working-class voters’ lives.

Husted is trying to appeal to those same voters. He has talked about watching his father lose his job at the Mohawk Tools factory in Montpelier, Ohio. He has campaigned on the Republican tax and domestic policy law that Trump signed last year — which Democrats opposed — arguing that it helped blue-collar workers by cutting taxes on overtime. And he has criticized Brown for supporting the Biden administration’s border policies, which he said undermined working-class wages.

Brown hasn’t changed, Husted said, but after decades in office, “the voters in Ohio have figured him out.”

“That’s why he lost to Bernie Moreno two years ago, and that’s why he’s going to lose again this year,” Husted told a crowd on a sunny Thursday evening last month at the Stark County Republican Party picnic.

Several unions that supported Brown in 2024 are backing Husted. So is the Cleveland Building and Construction Trades Council, which remained neutral two years ago.

Dave Wondolowski, the executive director of the Cleveland union, said he had seen no indication union members are more willing to support Brown than they were in 2024.

Wondolowski said Husted’s office has aided his union by helping push through more than a dozen project labor agreements, which set pay and conditions for workers on specific construction projects. He also faulted Brown’s ads aggressively criticizing data centers, which provide construction work for his union’s members.

“My members are standing back scratching their heads, saying, ‘I thought this guy said he was for us, and now he’s opposed to one of the biggest job creators that we’ve seen in decades,’” Wondolowski said.

A shift in Mansfield

In Mansfield, though, local labor leaders said some of their members who voted for Moreno in 2024 are more open to supporting Brown this year.

Brian McPeck II, the business manager of IBEW Local 688, said his members split roughly evenly between Brown and Moreno two years ago. Some complained that Brown had been in office too long.

This year, McPeck said, his union’s members remain frustrated with the economy — and he expects them to vote overwhelmingly for Brown.

“We don’t like the change that has happened, and we want change again,” McPeck said, describing the attitude of his members. “Honestly, the majority of the conversations that I’ve had have been like that.”

Morgan Hollenbach, 28, a union worker at the steel mill in Mansfield, said he voted for Trump and Moreno in 2024 but has been disappointed by Trump’s second term.

“I expected a lot of improvements within the economy that happened in 2017, and stuff’s only getting more expensive,” he said. “The price of gas is insane.”

Brown won over Hollenbach by visiting the picket line in nearby Shelby in February when steelworkers there went on strike — one of five picket lines that Brown has joined in Ohio since launching his campaign. He was “dumbfounded” Brown showed up, he said.

“So many politicians, prior to them getting in office, they say all these beautiful-sounding things to get you to vote for them — and then one thing leads to another and they fall short on a lot of their promises,” Hollenbach said. “But that guy was there, and I think it meant a lot to a lot of people. I know it did to me.”

Most fed officials penciled in a least one more expected hike by end of year lower interest rates.

“Rates in the United States should be 1%, or less, because we are the Best Credit in the World — BY FAR. Our Country is BOOMING with new Investment!” Trump wrote on Truth Social.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell by 700 points after the news, with some easing later, closing the day about 1.2 percent lower, even though investors had been expecting the hike. All the major indexes trended down. The 10-year Treasury yield is still hovering at a relative high of around 5 percent, as it has been throughout this week.

The goal of such a rate increase is to make consumers and companies more cautious about spending, which reduces demand for products and slows the rise in prices. But the Fed doesn’t take such increases lightly, because they also tend to cool the job market and dampen economic growth.

Inflation has remained higher than 3 percent through most of this year, well above the Fed’s target rate of 2 percent. And recent spikes in oil prices alongside surging demand tied to the build-out of artificial intelligence data centers have threatened to send prices rising faster.

Wednesday’s decision came after Fed policymakers held rates steady for five straight meetings this year as they waited to get a clearer understanding of inflation throughout the economy. Most Fed officials penciled in at least one more expected rate hike by the end of this year.

Fed Chair Kevin Warsh, a Fed governor from 2006 to 2011, returned to the central bank in May, after a year in which Trump pressured the Fed in ways without modern precedent. Trump repeatedly criticized Warsh’s predecessor, Jerome H. Powell, for refusing to bring rates down; he tried to remove Fed governor Lisa Cook; and he endorsed a Justice Department criminal investigation of Powell. Trump in January chose Warsh to fill the chairman’s seat occupied by Powell, who has stayed on at the Fed as a governor. The Justice Department probe was closed.

Fed raises interest rates

Warsh deflected a question during a news conference about Trump’s calls for rate cuts, saying he had “nothing for you” on that.

Warsh, 56, has promised to set rates without regard to political considerations. He also has said he intends to abandon a Fed practice of signaling what its officials intend to do next, saying that he does not want the central bank to box itself in before decision time, and that market participants should come to conclusions on their own about the direction of the economy.

In the news conference following the rate hike, Warsh offered an optimistic view of the economy.

“Consider the geopolitical landscape of shocks and uncertainty, and you begin to appreciate the resilience of the U.S.

economy. Given that resilience and the potential for even greater performance, an attitude of optimism is exactly what I heard inside the FOMC these last two days,” Warsh said, referring to the Federal Open Market Committee, the panel that controls interest rates.

The view of investors who expected a rate hike was bolstered this month when the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the U.S. economy added 162,000 jobs in August, more than expected. A healthier jobs outlook typically lessens anxiety among Fed policymakers about a rate hike worsening job prospects for the labor market.

In response to the August jobs report, Trump renewed his demand for the Fed to lower interest rates. But few economists, on the left or the right, took the president’s suggestion of lowering rates seriously.

“Nobody thinks they’re going to cut rates at this point, and it’s not going to happen,” Stephen Moore, a conservative economist who has advised Trump, said in an interview before Wednesday’s Fed meeting. “Kevin Warsh is not going to be bullied by Trump. But on the other hand, he doesn’t want to hurt the economy either. So it’s a tough balancing act for him right now.”

5 major takeaways from this year’s primary season

Six months of elections offer pointed insights into voter sentiment

BY DAN MERICA

The primaries for the 2026 midterms are over now that Delaware voters cast the final primary ballots Tuesday.

But lessons from these contests — including the problems both parties are facing with their brands and voters’ deep economic concerns — will play a major role in the critical mid-term elections less than seven weeks away and the open presidential contest to follow.

Here is what we learned from six months of primaries:

Even Republicans are fretting about the economy

No issue is more important this election than the state of the economy and high prices on gas, groceries and more. And voters on both sides of the political divide are practically, and in some cases literally, screaming this at their elected officials.

The economy was always going to be a major issue in this election, driven by rising prices from President Donald Trump’s increased tariffs and other economic factors. But that dynamic grew stronger when the United States began a war with Iran in February, a conflict that has dragged on for months and sent gas prices skyrocketing.

“Every time you ask voters what they care most about ... essentially they say cost of living in three different ways,” said Mike Smith, the head of House Majority PAC, the top Democratic super PAC focused on winning control of the House.

A Marquette Law School poll released last month found that half of American voters feel either “inflation and the cost of living” or broadly “the economy” is the top issue heading into the midterms.

What stands out in the polling, however, is how even Republicans have soured on Trump’s leadership on economic issues. Just 29 percent of Republicans said the economy is better now than it was a year ago, according to a New York Times-Siena poll released this week. That’s down from 72 percent in a January poll.

Trump has struggled to defend his economic record. While he named himself the “affordability president” last year, he later dismissed a focus on affordability as “a con job by the Democrats” and said higher gas prices are a small price to pay for the war in Iran.

Republicans like Rep. Ashley Hinson, who is running in a competitive Senate race in Iowa, have argued on the campaign trail that Trump and Republicans are working to improve things but are still rebuilding from where Democrats left the economy in 2024.

“That is at the heart of everything,” Hinson told The Washington Post. “And I’m reminding folks we are moving things forward and we’re trying to fix these problems. I understand that there is more to do here, and that’s exactly why I’m running.”

Democrats’ energy is coming from the left, with several notable establishment candidates losing to more progressive, and often younger, opponents.

One of the first hints came in Maine, where Gov. Janet Mills (D) failed to overcome a challenge from progressive Graham Platner in the state’s critical Senate primary. Mills was among Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer (D-New York)’s top recruits, with Democrats hell-bent on ousting Sen. Susan Collins (R). But Mills never overcame the energy and momentum Platner built, eventually bowing out weeks before the primary.

Platner would go on to end his own campaign after a woman he previously dated publicly accused him of sexual assault amid a string of other controversies. But in a sign of progressive power, former Maine state senator Troy Jackson (D), a Platner acolyte with many of the same positions, was picked by party activists to replace him.

Progressives picked up another Senate win in Michigan, where Abdul El-Sayed (D), a former public health official, defeated Rep. Haley Stevens (D) in a contentious race that turned on the progressive lambasting the congresswoman as a product of Washington.

“The left successfully tapped into the deep frustrations around the economy and the status quo and the establishments in both parties,” said Morris Katz, a Democratic operative who advised Platner and other progressive candidates. “That should be harnessed in general elections too. People do not want just more of the same.”

The left’s power was also defined by the rise of the Democratic Socialists of America, a once obscure group in American politics whose influence has grown after some members unexpectedly won House primaries and big-city mayoral elections.

One example came in Florida, where state Rep. Angie Nixon defeated Lt. Col. Alex Vindman, a key witness in Trump’s first impeachment trial, in the state’s Senate primary. Nixon, a member of the democratic socialist organization, raised just under $1 million in the primary, a staggeringly low number compared with the $16 million Vindman brought in. But the energy on the party’s left propelled Nixon to victory, stunning Democrats who thought Vindman would run away with the contest.

While there is clear energy on the left, it remains unclear whether it will help or hurt the party in November. Polls show Democrats are significantly more eager to vote in the midterm elections, and Republicans are starting to worry about a “scary” lack of enthusiasm among core voters ahead of midterms, a mood that could doom candidates in particularly tight races.

But the rise of the party’s far left has become a frequent campaign-trail attack.

“Primary season taught the country one clear verdict, and it’s that the Democrat Party handed the keys to the radical socialists who are now in complete control of their party,” said Mike Marinella, a spokesperson for House Republicans’ campaign arm, who called this trend “a big reason why Democrats are walking into a November rout.”

Antiestablishment anger is raging in both parties

It’s a bad time to be an incumbent.

Several high-profile incumbents — Democrats and Republicans — lost their primaries this year, often to opponents who seized on antiestablishment anger and voters’ disdain for Washington.

Republican Sens. John Cornyn (Texas) and Bill Cassidy (Louisiana) lost their primaries after Trump backed their opponents. The story was similar for Rep. Thomas Massie (R-Kentucky), who fell to a Trump-backed challenger after bucking his party on several issues.

Establishment Democrats had it even worse. House incumbents — in New York, Colorado and Michigan — lost as part of the aforementioned progressive wave.

Some incumbents — including longtime Rep. Al Green (D-Texas) — were also hit by Trump’s unprecedented campaign to draw new House districts outside the normal 10-year process.

Age also played a role in incumbent takedowns. Rep. John B. Larson, who was seeking a 15th term in office, lost his Connecticut primary to the former mayor of Hartford. But the record was mixed on questions about political gerontocracy. Sen. Ed Markey survived a challenge from Rep. Seth Moulton earlier this month, fending off questions about whether someone who will be 86 when their next term ends should keep serving.

Possibly the clearest example of anti-Washington fervor affecting a longtime elected official came in Colorado, when Sen. Michael Bennet (D) lost his primary to be the state’s next Democratic nominee for governor to state Attorney General Phil Weiser, who made the case to voters that he had been more aggressive in confronting Trump and lambasted Bennet as part of the problem in Washington.

“There is a great deal of cynicism about politicians and politics in general,” said Eileen Laubacher (D), a Navy veteran hoping anti-incumbent fervor will help her underdog bid to oust Rep. Lauren Boebert

(R-Colorado) in November. “People are looking for seriousness, and for people who they think are not actual politicians, who are not looking ... to become internet famous, to become wealthy, to be powerful. They want something different.”

Trump’s endorsement is still powerful, but losing steam

Trump’s endorsement has long been the most powerful in Republican politics.

He boasted an impressive record this primary season — pushing through several candidates others in his party regarded as flawed. But there were also signs his hold is weakening in some notable races.

Last month alone, his endorsed candidates lost major primaries in Minnesota, Michigan and Tennessee. They also lost several races in Florida, his adopted home state.

Trump is well aware of his win-loss record and has, at least once, tried to save face. In June, when his candidate for South Carolina’s primary for governor showed signs of struggle, he expanded his endorsement to a second candidate. He won, sort of.

Trump has fumed at any suggestion that he had a less-than-perfect success rate.

Trump did have some clear wins. He helped Texas Attorney General Ken Paxton (R) defeat Cornyn in the primary despite a sweep of scandals; successfully pushed Sen. Darline Graham through a competitive primary to replace her brother, the late Sen. Lindsey Graham, in South Carolina; and successfully ousted most of the Indiana state senators who defied his call to redistrict the state.

But the losses — once rare for the Republican leader — hint at a restive Republican base open to options beyond the party’s standard-bearer for over a decade.

Niche, and formerly niche, issues could swing elections

Two years ago, the rise of data centers was largely an issue playing out in city council chambers and small community meeting halls.

Today, no single new issue may be more resonant with Americans than the proliferation of these buildings, with voters seeing them as relevant to concerns such as energy prices, job insecurity and the rise of unchecked technology.

“The pervasiveness of tech in our lives is felt everywhere and yet it is invisible,” said Sacha Haworth, the head of the Tech Oversight Project, an accountability organization focused on the technology industry. “A data center is the physical manifestation of tech’s pervasiveness in our lives.”

The issue has energized candidates nationwide, becoming a symbol of Americans’ rage and bringing Democrats and Republicans together in a way few other concerns have.

Democrats have looked to seize on this antipathy, with many running ads and speaking out about data center projects in communities that do not want them. Some have called for an outright moratorium.

Trump has positioned his party behind data centers, though some candidates have started to stray. “The only reason that communities throughout the U.S.A. should not want Data Centers is if they want to end up being backwards and poor,” Trump wrote recently.

Other more niche issues have captured the political zeitgeist, too. Surveillance systems known as automated license-plate readers, especially those produced by Flock, have become a relevant campaign issue with bipartisan detractors.

And Democrats saw this year that money from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, a pro-Israel organization that drew the ire of Democratic voters because of Israel’s war in Gaza, was a focal point in primaries. The trend led to some of the most fervent attacks against candidates who accepted money tied to the group, a movement that could become relevant in the general election as the group boosts Republicans in key races.

Review of social media reveals that Republicans aren’t heeding Trump’s advice to sell you,” Rep. Jesús “Chuy” García (D-Illinois) posted on X. Rep. Chellie Pingree (D-Maine) posted that the proposal was “flagrantly illegal and pathetically desperate.”

Of the Republicans who did comment, many were also critical. Rep. Eric Burlison (R-Missouri) told a home-state radio station that the payment idea “is by definition socialism.” But the promise has almost disappeared from politicians’ social media feeds since then.

House Speaker Mike Johnson (R-Louisiana), who spoke at the convention, has been noncommittal in his public comments and has not touted the measure on his X accounts. Johnson told reporters on Tuesday that lawmakers need more time “to process” the president’s $5,000 plan.

“It takes a long time to build consensus around these things. And that’s a big idea that’s going to take a lot of process,” Johnson said, adding that the work has begun and that he spoke with Trump about it Monday night.

Trump’s proposal came as a surprise to Senate Republicans. Senate Majority Leader John Thune (R-South Dakota) said Monday that he did not get a heads-up about it before Trump’s speech.

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Kentucky) said he did not see how the idea could be branded a “dividend” by Trump when the federal government is running enormous deficits.

“You give a dividend if you have money in profit,” Paul told reporters. “There is no profit. There’s a $2 trillion loss occurring each year. I don’t know how you give money that you don’t have.”

Sen. John Kennedy (R-Louisiana), a member of the Budget Committee, said he was withholding judgment until he learns how the White House plans to pay for it.

“I don’t support going and borrowing $1.2 trillion to be able to write the checks,” Kennedy said, adding that he believes the White House will find a way to pay for the program.

The idea might be tough to talk about on the campaign trail because it goes against basic conservative philosophy and would make inflation worse, said Chris Saxman, a longtime GOP operative in Virginia and former Republican state delegate.

“We’re $40 trillion in debt. This is not how you pay for the ongoing inflation problem,” he said, casting doubt on the chances of passing it.

On the other hand, he said, Trump simply floating the idea will put it in people’s minds and could attract enough economically struggling voters to tip close races. “Regardless of the efficacy of the policy, the politics is pretty strong,” Saxman said.

Some Republicans have embraced the concept.

Sen. Bernie Moreno (R-Ohio) immediately pledged to draft legislation to implement Trump’s idea. He told reporters Monday that he planned to introduce the bill “the minute the election’s over.”

Moreno said he wants to call the $5,000 checks the “Trump dividend of success,” or TDS — an acronym that Trump and other Republicans often use to refer to “Trump Derangement Syndrome,” or the idea that Trump’s critics are motivated by irrational animosity toward him.

He claimed that his bill would cost taxpayers nothing and said it could “potentially reduce the deficit,” though he declined to specify how.

He was also cagey about the timing, insisting he would not have the votes to pass it by Election Day because Congress is too busy until then.

“The Democrats freaking out about this is kind of hilarious, because these are the same people that say, ‘Well, vote for Democrats, we’ll give you free health care,’” Moreno said. “Vote for Democrats, we’ll forgive your student loans. Vote for Democrats, you’re getting covid stimulus checks.”

Two of the three covid-era stimulus checks were approved during Trump’s first term in office.

President Donald Trump’s 250-foot-tall proposed arch would be built in Memorial Circle, a traffic roundabout tucked inside Washington’s boundaries near Arlington National Cemetery.

Officials acknowledge D.C. arch project’s ‘adverse effects’ on dozens of sites

ARCH FROM A1

The document is a proposed agreement that the administration wants local historic-preservation officers to sign onto as part of a federally required process to offer feedback on the project.

The NPS proposal says that since the harms cannot be avoided, federal officials would pursue efforts that they contend would mitigate the arch’s impact, such as creating new signs and webpages to explain the project to the public.

Officials also said they would manage construction to reduce interference with burials at the cemetery and document the current landscape before construction begins.

“NPS recognizes that Memorial Circle is located within a highly sensitive historic and commemorative landscape and that the Undertaking’s location contributes to adverse effects to historic properties whose significance is associated with setting, design, feeling, association, spatial organization, circulation, and contributing views and vistas,” the proposed agreement says.

Tammy Stidham, a senior NPS official, asked the preservationists, local historic preservation officers and other groups to review and sign the agreement by 12 p.m. on Monday, according to an email obtained by The Post. Their assent would help conclude the administration’s required consultations under the National Historic Preservation Act, particularly a provision known as Section 106, and expedite the process of securing final approval for the arch.

Stidham said last week that the administration hopes to submit the project for approval from the National Capital Planning Commission, a review panel that oversees federal construction projects, as soon as November.

Stidham and the Interior Department, which oversees NPS, did not respond to questions about the proposed agreement.

An Interior Department spokesperson defended the administration’s approach to the arch and soliciting public comment.

“Throughout the consultation process, Interior has received over 100,000 public comments, has accepted dozens of organizations as consulting parties, and has extended comment periods to allow for more robust discussion,” the spokesperson wrote in an email. “To infer this process is unlawful shows a lack of understanding of the facts on the ground as well as how the Section 106 process works.”

Trump has said that the arch should be the tallest in the world and be specifically 250 feet high to mark the nation’s 250th anniversary, which was celebrated this year. The president and his deputies have also asserted that the arch must be built in Memorial Circle because lawmakers a century ago authorized a somewhat similar project that was never built there.

“The Triumphal Arch in Memorial Circle is going to be one of the most iconic landmarks not only in Washington, D.C., but throughout the world,” White House spokesman Davis

Ingle said in a statement. “It will enhance the visitor experience at Arlington National Cemetery for veterans, the families of the fallen, and all Americans alike, serving as a visual reminder of the noble sacrifices borne by so many American heroes throughout our 250 year history so we can enjoy our freedoms today.”

Local historic preservationists have said that the administration’s timeline to wind down public input and begin building the arch is overly aggressive. They also criticized the proposed agreement, saying it falls short under federal requirements that the administration must avoid or minimize the harms of a project, rather than just mitigate those harms.

“This is not consistent with NPS practice, NPS regulations, or the intent of the National Historic Preservation Act,” Rebecca Miller, executive director of the DC Preservation League, wrote Tuesday to Stidham, other federal officials and colleagues at preservation organizations. Miller also called for the administration to continue its efforts to consult with local preservationists about alternative approaches to building the arch. The email was shared with The Post.

NPS officials previously said that they have explored changes to the arch proposal.

“We looked at a smaller arch height. We considered a relocation of the project altogether,” Stidham said at a meeting with preservationists last week, according to audio posted online by NPS. “It was determined that the options would either create a greater impact on historic properties or would not meet the undertaking’s location-dependent purpose need.”

Federal officials also say they would create several webpages, including one devoted to triumphal arches, to help explain the significance of Trump’s project.

“The webpage would address the origins and use of triumphal arches in different historical and cultural contexts, their association with military victory, civic identity, national celebration, and public memory, and how the proposed Arch relates to or differs from those traditions,” according to the NPS document obtained by The Post.

Historic preservationists say that the proposed mitigations are insufficient and that officials should slow their process.

“The administration is being very transparent in their overt hostility to public input and the regulatory process and the result will be to permanently disfigure one of the nation’s most revered and richly symbolic cultural landscapes,” Charles Birnbaum, founder of the Cultural Landscape Foundation, a local advocacy and education organization, said in a statement.

If the local preservation officers refuse to sign the agreement, it could trigger a process overseen by the Advisory Council on Historic Preservation, a federal agency led by Trump officials, to address disputes under federal preservation law. The administration does not need the preservationists’ consent to move forward.

The Advisory Council on Historic Preservation declined to comment Wednesday.

U.S. Catholic bishops meet with AI firms on ‘catastrophic’ perils

BY MICHELLE BOORSTEIN AND GERRIT DE VYNCK

Leaders of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops met Wednesday with top tech firms and other experts in artificial intelligence to discuss “catastrophic, existential risk” potentially posed by the new technology.

The two-hour meeting at the USCCB headquarters in D.C. was the latest in a series of high-level conversations between tech firm representatives and faith leaders from multiple traditions as the industry recognizes the public is more urgently questioning whether AI is ethical.

The session was scheduled before recent public comments by AI insiders saying AI is developing too fast and could become a major danger. But there is new urgency from those recent comments, including by a former employee of Anthropic and OpenAI who went globally viral last week for saying AI could lead to human extinction.

The meeting was supposed to be “focused on catastrophic, existential risk,” said Catholic University theologian Charles Camosy, who helped organize the event. Topics included the use of AI in health care and the military as well as the question of how to bring the United States and China into dialogue.

The bishops also launched a Task Force on Preserving Human Dignity in the Age of Artificial Intelligence, which will be led by San Jose Bishop Oscar Cantú.

Camosy said the mood in the room was intense. “People were nervous,” he said. “We’ve never been in this moment before as a human race.”

The names of the tech firms and their representatives who attended were not made public. Camosy said they were “frontier AI companies,” which typically refers to Google, OpenAI and Anthropic. Spokespeople for those companies did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

With public sentiment broadly turning against AI, some tech executives have called for the industry to do a better of job of explaining why artificial intelligence will have a positive impact on humanity.

Anthropic, the maker of the Claude chatbot, has also turned to religious leaders for help in designing its AI to try and make it more ethical. In March, Anthropic hosted Catholic leaders to consult on how to “raise” AI into displaying more moral behavior. One of the company’s co-founders, Chris Olah, presented alongside Pope Leo XIV in May when the pontiff released a major teaching document about the church’s approach to AI.

Representatives of other faiths also have met with AI firms, including the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, other Christian groups, Baha’i and Sikhs.

In a piece this week in the Washington Examiner, Camosy wrote that he and Cantú held an event at a Catholic school gym in Silicon Valley soon after Leo’s teaching document was released and over 300 industry people showed up. He said California Rep. Ro Khanna (D) also led a delegation to Rome to talk with the pope about AI, and then sent letters to the CEOs of Amazon, Anthropic, Apple, Google, Meta, Microsoft, Nvidia, and OpenAI — “asking each of them how their products align with the Pope’s principles of human dignity.”

A statement from the USCCB on Wednesday said the meeting “focused on ways to keep any system of Artificial Intelligence at the service of humanity and the urgent need to address the real and present dangers such technology present.” It said the goal is “ensuring that technology is used in ways that keep it human-centered, respecting the dignity of each person, and benefiting all — poor and rich alike.”

After the meeting, more than a dozen of the bishops went to Capitol Hill to meet with members of Congress to urge passage of “meaningful safety guardrails on Artificial Intelligence and to support legislation to protect children online,” the USCCB said.

The United States this year has reported the most measles cases since 1991 and it makes America sicker, not healthier,” said Cassidy, who lost his primary bid for reelection this year.

Department of Health and Human Services spokeswoman Emily Hilliard said in a statement that “any notion that the Trump Administration is discouraging measles vaccination is absolutely fake news.” She added that Health Secretary Robert F. Kennedy Jr. has “repeatedly stated that MMR vaccination is the most effective way to prevent measles infection.”

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, Hilliard said, has “mounted an aggressive measles response” and offered further assistance to Pennsylvania.

Trump’s executive order, she added, “ensures that federal vaccine policy is grounded in rigorous scientific review and gives parents accurate information to make informed decisions with their healthcare providers.”

The recent deaths in Pennsylvania have launched a bitter political feud between Gov. Josh Shapiro, a Democrat who is widely expected to run for president, and Kennedy, the founder of a prominent anti-vaccine group. Democrats and public health experts contend that Kennedy has a history of downplaying measles outbreaks, and that his rhetoric over the years has undermined immunizations. Kennedy has accused Shapiro of using the moment for political gain.

During Wednesday’s hearing, senators quizzed Nicole Saphier, Trump’s pick for surgeon general, and two other high-profile nominees on a range of topics, including state abortion bans, fentanyl test strips and the authorization of the first fruit-flavored vapes for adults.

In the spring, Trump selected Saphier — a former Fox News contributor and radiologist at Memorial Sloan Kettering Cancer Center in New York — to be the nation’s top doctor, marking his third attempt to fill the role.

Cassidy said that Americans will look to Saphier for “clear medical guidance.” He repeatedly quizzed her on her stance on several vaccines, asking her not to equivocate. He asked her what she would tell a mom who asks if the MMR vaccine causes autism.

“Well, humbly, I don’t know what causes autism, but I have not seen reputable evidence that would suggest that vaccines cause autism,” she said.

After Cassidy accused her of leaving wiggle room in her response, she said, “I do not believe childhood vaccines cause autism.”

Last month, Trump said that the combined MMR vaccine could be “quite lethal,” without citing scientific evidence. Under Trump’s plan, vaccines against measles, mumps and rubella would remain recommended for all children; he has called for breaking up the immunization into three separate shots, which are not currently available in the United States. His directives on childhood immunizations are not currently in effect, since they involve a lengthy administrative process.

During Wednesday’s hearing, senators quizzed Nicole Saphier, above, President Donald Trump’s pick for surgeon general, and two other high-profile nominees.

Saphier said she could not speak to the president’s remarks, adding that as a physician she does not believe the vaccine to be lethal and that it is “our greatest tool for combating measles infections.”

Two other nominees also appeared before the Senate HELP Committee on Wednesday. Chris Klomp, who is vying for the health department’s No. 2 slot; however, the decision on whether to advance the nomination of Klomp, who came into the administration as the top Medicare official and has been serving as Kennedy’s chief counselor since February, will go through the Senate Finance Committee.

Senators also questioned Timothy Westlake, Trump’s pick to head the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, which leads policy efforts on mental health and addiction. He is a board-certified emergency physician.

Sen. Maggie Hassan (D-New Hampshire) asked about fentanyl test strips, saying she has heard from constituents that the products help prevent fatal overdoses by testing whether a drug has been mixed or cut with the powerful synthetic opioid. Westlake said that he does not believe there is concrete evidence the strips reduce drug overdoses.

Cassidy questioned Klomp on a CDC national tally of measles deaths, which has excluded two that state health officials reported in Lancaster County, Pennsylvania. The move, which former officials have described as highly unusual, came from Erica Schwartz, the agency’s new director, The Washington Post previously reported.

Cassidy said he’s spoken with

Schwartz, who said the agency is working on a definition for deaths due to measles. “If people are dying from measles, the American people should know that,” Cassidy said. “And there’s at least the perception, whether it’s true or not, that the CDC not putting on that website is trying to dance around the sensitivities of the secretary, as opposed to being straightforward with the American people.”

Klomp said he’s discussed the issue directly with Schwartz, “not as a matter of policy but as a matter of process and operations,” adding that she’s meeting with the Council of State and Territorial Epidemiologists to develop a standard for declaring a measles-related death.

The government should promote measles vaccination as a response to the outbreak, he added.

Sen. John Hickenlooper (D-Colorado) asked each nominee how they intend to preserve the integrity and independence of scientists and health experts working at their agencies. Former CDC director Susan Monarez was fired last year, and three other high-ranking officials at the agency resigned a year ago to protest what they called Kennedy’s politicization of science.

Klomp responded that the country needs to make a distinction between “science and policy” and “facts and data,” emphasizing the need for transparency. Saphier said that as a physician, her “professional integrity is everything,” and she will do “nothing to jeopardize that professional integrity.” Westlake said that following the science means to “follow the evidence wherever it leads.”

The nominations come as Trump officials have swapped some of Kennedy’s handpicked deputies this year for people with more traditional experience. The changes have frustrated some supporters of the Make America Healthy Again movement championed by Kennedy, which was built on the notion of ushering in new health department leaders who challenged the medical establishment.

The move to elevate Saphier put an end to the nomination of Casey Means, who is influential within the MAHA movement, as her nomination stalled in the Senate. Trump earlier withdrew the nomination of Janette Neshewat, his first pick to serve in the role. The position of surgeon general has a powerful bully pulpit — helping fight HIV, smoking, obesity and addiction — but has a more limited role in policymaking.

Before being nominated, Saphier had criticized some actions that HHS had taken under Kennedy’s leadership.

Last year, the CDC revised its website to contradict the long-settled scientific conclusion that vaccines do not cause autism. On a November episode of her podcast, Saphier said that the website sounded like “someone without a science background wrote it.” In March, a federal judge halted Kennedy’s vaccine overhaul; Saphier wrote on X that “the system needed reform, but not chaos.” It does not appear that every previous tweet of hers is available.

“Dr. Nicole Saphier is an accomplished physician who has practiced radiology at Memorial Sloan-Kettering and has been an outspoken voice on breast cancer prevention, intrusive COVID-19 mandates, the politicization of science, and the federal government’s role in America’s chronic disease epidemic,” White House spokesman Kush Desai said in a statement. “She has been a powerful asset for President Trump and works tirelessly to deliver on every facet of his MAHA agenda.”

She will be divesting her holdings in an array of companies, some of which affect Americans’ health and which Kennedy has accused of helping fuel chronic diseases. This includes but is not limited to the soda and food industries, as well as pharmaceutical companies, according to financial disclosure and ethics forms.

Her ethics agreement notes the positions she will step away from or take unpaid leaves of absence. This includes resigning, upon confirmation by the Senate, her position from DropRx — her company that sells dietary and herbal supplements — and Empower MD, which owns DropRx. Medical experts have raised questions about the supplement industry, given it is not strongly regulated.

ICE warning to critic probably violated First Amendment, judge rules

BY JOANNA SLATER

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement likely violated the Constitution when agents delivered a warning notice to a man in Rochester, New York, over a caustic email he had sent the agency’s leader months earlier, a federal judge ruled late Tuesday.

David Streever sued the Department of Homeland Security in July after two federal agents came to his home seeking to have him sign an unusual warning letter saying his email could be a crime. They then tracked him to a hotel in New York City where he was staying with his 7-year-old daughter after returning from an overseas trip.

Streever accused the agency of infringing on his right to freedom of speech. U.S. District Judge Rudolph Contreras ruled Tuesday that Streever’s claim is likely to succeed and issued a preliminary injunction blocking DHS from making further threats to Streever.

The warning notice delivered to Streever “practically shouts” that he “may be prosecuted if he continues to engage in his political speech,” Contreras wrote.

In late January, after two Americans were killed by federal agents in Minnesota, Streever sent a brief, scathing email to Todd M. Lyons, then the acting director of ICE. Streever called Lyons a “monstrous human being” and “America’s Reinhard Heydrich,” a reference to a high-ranking official in Nazi Germany who oversaw the regime’s secret police.

“You will never know peace,” Streever concluded. “You will seek to lose yourself, to escape the burden of knowing the truth about yourself. ... You will torment yourself until your last day on Earth.”

But the First Amendment protects such criticism of public officials, Contreras wrote. Although Streever’s email was “not kind, and may not have been particularly productive, it was a far cry” from the type of speech — an actual threat — that is not constitutionally protected, Contreras said.

As a result of the warning notice delivered by the two federal agents, the threat of investigation or prosecution loomed over Streever “like the sword of Damocles,” Contreras wrote.

In response to the ruling, a DHS spokesperson said in a statement that “any allegation DHS and its components are attempting to ‘squash’ free speech is categorically FALSE.”

Streever was not the only person to receive a warning notice: Agents presented the same form to Paigelyne Gonyea, a resident of Syracuse, New York, and accused her of revealing an ICE agent’s address online, something she denies.

FOUNDATION FOR INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS AND EXPRESSION

DHS agents came to David Streever’s home in Rochester, New York, in June.

Civil liberties experts said the warning notices are part of a broader effort by DHS to track and intimidate its critics. Those tactics include the use of administrative subpoenas to unmask anonymous critics, experts said, along with threats to prosecute people who exercise their rights to document law enforcement operations.

Streever is represented by the Foundation for Individual Rights and Expression, a free-speech nonprofit. He welcomed the judge’s ruling in a statement. “I’m deeply relieved that the court affirmed what I knew all along: that I am permitted to speak my conscience in the United States of America,” Streever said.

In a declaration submitted to the court in Streever’s case, a senior ICE official cited a “dramatic” increase in threats to agency personnel since early last year. The official said the agency closed its investigation into Streever’s email on June 30 and had no plans to contact him again. In their court filings, Justice Department lawyers did not argue that Streever’s email contained a threat.

On Wednesday, the DHS spokesperson reiterated that the department “investigates all credible threats toward its employees and officers, including threats to the ICE Director.” DHS declined to say how many people have received warning notices like those given to Streever and Gonyea.

Democratic fundraising machine under GOP investigation is fighting back

Republicans claim that ActBlue didn’t properly vet foreign donations

BY PRAVEENA SOMASUNDARAM

ActBlue, the top Democratic fundraising platform that has been embroiled in years of GOP investigations over whether it improperly vetted foreign donations, is escalating efforts to clear its name.

A law firm representing the group met congressional investigators Friday to present a third-party review of ActBlue’s donation history, arguing that the company properly verified the source of contributions and did not mislead lawmakers about that process. But the new report is unlikely to end the problems for the group that Democrats have relied upon to process billions of dollars in campaign donations.

ActBlue’s internal review was meant to counter allegations it failed to properly vet donations, the subject of investigations by Republicans in Congress and the Justice Department at the direction of President Donald Trump.

GOP lawmakers weren’t convinced, according to a Republican who heard the briefing and spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss a private meeting.

The person described ActBlue’s review as a “self-serving analysis” that probably wouldn’t affect the course of the ongoing House investigation.

ActBlue continues to operate as a vehicle for small donations to Democrats, but its future is unclear with investigations underway. The standoff is playing out with only two months left until the midterms, where money could make a difference in races that will determine control of Congress. The same goes for 2028, when Democrats hope to retake the White House.

ActBlue and its supporters have painted the Republican probes as baseless and politically motivated.

TOM WILLIAMS/CQ-ROLL CALL/GETTY IMAGES

ActBlue CEO Regina Wallace-Jones prepares to testify before the House Administration Committee in June. During the hearing, she repeatedly invoked the Fifth Amendment.

“We must continue to stand against all efforts to undermine the grassroots infrastructure that powers the Democratic Party,” ActBlue CEO Regina Wallace-Jones said in a statement to The Washington Post.

The new analysis, conducted by the Washington-based firm FTI Consulting and presented Friday by the law firm WilmerHale, ActBlue gave itself a chance to raise its voice in the saga after Republican attacks and reports of warnings from its lawyers.

House Republicans in 2023 asked the fundraising platform to share information about how it verified donors. Wallace-Jones responded with a letter outlining the steps she said ActBlue followed to verify contributions, including asking donors with a foreign address to provide a U.S. passport number and refunding donors who could not be reached.

Previous lawyers for ActBlue from the firm Covington & Burling had concerns about the letter, the New York Times reported in April. In 2025, those lawyers told ActBlue that Wallace-Jones may have misled Congress in her response because the steps for vetting foreign donations were not always followed, according to the Times.

During her June appearance before Congress, Wallace-Jones declined to answer questions, repeatedly invoking the Fifth Amendment. Before her testimony, she wrote in an essay published in The Washington Post that invoking the amendment was the “only reasonable response” to a hearing she characterized as “harassing a political opponent’s fundraising platform, not genuine oversight.”

During Friday’s meeting, ActBlue’s presentation said Wallace-Jones “accurately described” how the group verified its donors, according to a copy reviewed by The Post.

In 2023, the group received $990 million in donations. Of that, only about $1.3 million came from donors with foreign addresses, according to the new analysis. ActBlue said it collected passport numbers for 93 percent of the donations with foreign addresses to verify citizenship.

In a Saturday letter to the Republican chairs of the three investigating committees, a lawyer for ActBlue wrote that the review showed foreign donations were “vanishingly rare” and that it carried out the process Wallace-Jones described in her letter in nearly all cases. The donations ActBlue processed without evidence of citizenship were “immaterial,” according to its presentation.

Rep. Jamie Raskin (Maryland), the ranking Democrat on the House Judiciary Committee that is investigating the case, said the findings of ActBlue’s review “directly refute the central premise of the Committees’ allegations.”

“The time has come for our Republican colleagues to shut down this baseless and weaponized investigation,” Raskin said in a statement.

The Republican who heard ActBlue’s presentation said the Friday briefing lacked credibility coming from a new law firm after previous ActBlue lawyers raised concerns.

“They sought out a different law firm to try to give them a different result and once they did, they came into Congress and immediately wanted to tell us this,” the person said.

Charlie Kirk’s family alleges security failures contributed to his death

His relatives accuse Utah officials of ‘reckless decisions’

BY HANNAH KNOWLES

Before Charlie Kirk was fatally shot at a college event in Utah, his organization asked campus police for help securing nearby rooftops.

If students could access the roof, “it would be nice to either have it controlled access or allow one of my guys to be there as well,” an official with Kirk’s organization, Turning Point USA, texted the police chief at Utah Valley University, according to legal documents.

“I got you covered,” the police chief allegedly responded.

Representatives for Kirk’s family say that exchange shows how Utah officials’ security lapses contributed to Kirk’s death on Sept. 10, 2025, when a gunman fired on him from a rooftop. On Wednesday, family representatives made public a “notice of claim” filed against the state of Utah and university officials, a procedural step necessary ahead of a potential lawsuit.

“Through a series of stunning failures and reckless decisions, the [Utah officials] created a foreseeable danger to Charlie,” the notice of claim says.

Sharon Turner, a spokesperson for Utah Valley University, said the school is aware of the notice of claim. “UVU addresses legal matters consistent with our established processes,” Turner said in a statement. “Our focus remains on supporting our campus community.”

UVU said shortly after Kirk’s killing that it would seek an outside review of the event and the school’s response, but it has not yet released findings. Turner said officials expect the review to be completed soon.

“When we get the report, it will be very comprehensive,” UVU President Jon Anderson, who took over the position after Kirk’s death, recently told the Salt Lake Tribune. “And it’s just taken time to get it to that point.”

The notice of claim from Kirk’s family, sent to the Utah Attorney General’s Office last week, says authorities did not adequately prepare for Kirk’s visit to the state-funded university, despite his high profile and the violence against other political figures in recent years. They “did not conduct a meaningful risk assessment” before approving the outdoor event, the notice alleges, and UVU police did not have a written security plan for it.

The UVU police chief, Jeffrey Long, asked the university’s then-president to assign more than six officers — a fourth of the campus police force — to the event but was denied, according to the document.

“Indeed, the UVU Parties’ planning was so deficient that when Mr. Kirk was shot first responders were not available and Mr. Kirk was transported to Timpanogos Regional Hospital in a private vehicle, not an ambulance,” the document states.

Kirk’s family representatives also say the importance of rooftop security should have been especially clear given that President Donald Trump — a friend and ally of Kirk — was injured by a rooftop shooter the year prior. Trump was shot at a campaign rally in Pennsylvania.

Tools such as drones and real-time monitoring of CCTV footage could have helped prevent the shooting as well, the notice of claim says, noting that video footage presented in the criminal case shows the shooter running across the roof.

The Kirk family’s move to preserve their right to a lawsuit comes around the first anniversary of Kirk’s death. A judge recently ruled that the alleged shooter, Tyler James Robinson, will stand trial on charges that could carry the death penalty. A trial date has not been set.

Members of Kirk’s family, including his widow, Erika Kirk, have been attending hearings in Robinson’s case, and their representatives have emphasized the importance of a speedy trial.

A fringe AI movement has Washington talking about human extinction

Activists have spent years cultivating allies on Capitol Hill

BY IAN DUNCAN AND NITASHA TIKU

When Sen. Bernie Sanders traveled to the Bay Area this year to question the impact of artificial intelligence, he sought out different perspectives. The result was a “handful” of meetings, including with tech executives, the senator’s longtime political strategist Faiz Shakir said. “If they wanted to be on camera, he said, ‘Great, let’s do this publicly!’” Shakir said.

But when Sanders posted a video from his trip in March, it showed him talking with only one controversial faction: people convinced that advanced AI is likely to lead to human extinction.

“Once they don’t need the humans, the humans are discarded,” Eliezer Yudkowsky, who has spent two decades warning about AI eradicating people, said in the video. Sanders, sitting with his chief of staff, appeared shocked. “That’s scary,” he said.

The meeting between Sanders and advocates of the idea that powerful AI will threaten humanity’s future occurred amid a years-long drive by activists to forge connections in Congress and elevate their concerns. In recent days, that work appeared to have paid off.

After Anthropic researcher Jacob Coxon resigned last week and said the people building AI feared it could “kill us all by the end of the decade,” existential debate gripped Washington. Lawmakers from both major parties began to echo warnings that AI could snuff out humans.

Connor Leahy, head of the U.S. arm of ControlAI, an organization seeking to ban artificial superintelligence, said the shift has been years in the making. His team spoke with 200 congressional offices in the past 18 months, he said, working to spread what they see as a crucial warning.

“The way a lot of these kind of politics tends to work is that something is completely impossible until it’s very suddenly not,” Leahy said. “Things can change very quickly. And we’ve been seeing a lot of very-suddenly-not’s lately.”

In a subterranean Washington ballroom Tuesday, Sanders ticked through a list of artificial intelligence’s potential downsides including economic disruption, educational decline and mass surveillance, before warning there was one scarier still.

“If AI surpasses human intelligence, as many scientists believe could happen, this technology will escape human control with potentially catastrophic consequences,” Sanders said.

He spoke at a conference branded as the Pro-Human Assembly that also featured former Trump adviser and “War Room” podcast host Stephen K. Bannon. The event was organized by the Future of Life Institute, a nonprofit that has been warning about the dire risks posed by AI for over a decade as part of what is known as the AI safety movement.

On Wednesday, Rep. Ted Lieu (D-California) is set to headline an event at the Capitol Visitor Center that includes a screening for members of Congress of a documentary about the race to build powerful AI that features prominent doomsayers including Yudkowsky. The event is co-hosted by the nonprofit Alliance for Secure AI, which has been funded in part by a prominent philanthropy focused on AI safety. Brendan Steinhauser, who heads the group, said it has held 150 meetings on Capitol Hill in the past year.

Sanders has organized his own AI event on Wednesday: a private briefing for his colleagues featuring Max Tegmark, chair of the Future of Life Institute.

Alarm about the idea that AI poses an extinction threat has been until recently largely confined to the fringes of politics and the tech industry.

The AI safety movement emerged from Bay Area subcultures that became fixated on safeguarding advanced AI. It flourished over the past decade with support from a small number of wealthy tech executives. The movement is expected to receive huge cash infusions in coming years as AI company employees cash out stock in startups like Anthropic and OpenAI. (The Washington Post has a content partnership with OpenAI.)

The Future of Life Institute was co-founded in 2014 by a group that included tech billionaire Jaan Tallinn, an early Skype employee. He has become one of the most active funders of the network of nonprofits that work on causes related to existential risk for AI, alongside billionaire Facebook co-founder Dustin Moskovitz, a major Democratic donor. Many of the AI safety groups they backed have filed federal lobbying disclosures this year.

Sneha Revanur, the founder of Encode AI, a nonprofit focused on AI risks including catastrophic harm, child safety and concentration of power, said it has recently gotten easier to talk about those issues in Washington.

When she first came to Capitol Hill in 2023, her organization would be lucky to get 20 minutes on someone’s calendar, Revanur said. Now the group is able to have “extremely clear and forthright conversations about things like extinction,” she said.

Encode was partly funded by the Future of Life Institute and another organization linked to Tallinn.

Despite its resources and the apparent breakthrough of recent days, the AI safety movement faces serious challenges in a gridlocked Washington where Democrats have been quicker to take up the cause of regulation. Opposition to the doomsday warnings of the past week has been fierce, with President Donald Trump leading the charge and calling them a “hoax.”

The president’s response stoked fears within the safety movement that their cause was increasingly being seen as a partisan one, despite activists’ efforts to gain influence with Democrats and Republicans, including recent podcast interviews with Joe Rogan and Tucker Carlson.

“We lean more libertarian than left or right,” said Jeffrey Ladish, executive director of the nonprofit Palisade Research and a former security engineer at Anthropic who also appeared in the video with Sanders and Yudkowsky.

Most people in the AI safety community are opposed to regulating technology unless it’s something as powerful as AI or nuclear or biological weapons, he said. “This whole effort to paint the AI safety world as some sort of woke conspiracy is just not accurate,” Ladish said.

Revanur, who appeared on Fox News on Tuesday morning, said recent attempts to dismiss AI safety organizations by tech allies of Trump ignored the fact that polling shows voters across the political spectrum are concerned about AI.

Onstage at the Pro-Human Assembly, organizers emphasized that they had the backing of figures on the left and the right. Immediately after Sanders stepped offstage, he was replaced by Bannon.

The former Trump adviser said the presence of two such diametrically opposed partisans was a reflection of the threat posed by AI.

“This is a hinge in history,” he said. “We have to handle this correctly.”

Recent debate about AI’s potential existential threat comes as political groups try to find a message on the technology that fits the moment.

This month, Karthik Ganapathy, a former aide to Sanders, launched a political action committee called Tomorrow Together to push Democrats to address voter anxiety. It has raised more than $10 million from party donors and AI safety advocates through the PAC and an affiliated nonprofit.

The group initially focused on the technology’s impact on jobs and education, where voters seemed likely to first feel AI’s effects. But that issue has received little attention in the past week.

“The script has totally flipped — if you’d told me two months ago or even two weeks ago we’d have members of Congress saying leadership should stay in town until an AI safety bill is passed, I wouldn’t have believed you,” said Ganapathy, who left his role in May as a senior communications officer for Co-efficient Giving, the dominant philanthropic donor in AI safety, backed by Moskovitz.

“This conversation has gone from abstract to feeling pretty urgent in the matter of weeks, and it’s scrambling politics quickly,” Ganapathy said.

Encode helped organize a recent open letter signed by almost 1,400 current employees supporting the idea of “pacing the frontier,” a coordinated slowdown of AI development to tame the technology’s cutting edge.

In the wake of Coxon’s resignation, several of his Anthropic colleagues as well as workers at rivals OpenAI and Google made public statements supporting his concerns about extinction risk from rogue AI.

The public calls for attention to the issue were followed on Saturday by an intervention by Dario Amodei, chief executive of Anthropic, who called for a industry-wide slowdown. OpenAI chief executive Sam Altman and tech mogul Elon Musk quickly endorsed the proposal.

On Tuesday, Altman acknowledged the AI fears but said he was “disappointed” in how the debate has been framed.

“I think the world is right to be afraid of this,” he said at a conference held by software company Salesforce in San Francisco. “The world should trust that we are going to do the right thing because it’s the right thing and because we feel the magnitude of this.”

Chris Lehane, OpenAI’s head of global affairs, told reporters Tuesday that the company has been working for several weeks with its competitors to set common standards.

“This is ultimately about how we can develop better and smarter safety systems as we move forward,” Lehane said.

But an approach steered by the industry is not likely to allay the concerns of those who fear the technology most, nor lawmakers skeptical of allowing powerful companies to regulate themselves.

“If the lives of every man, woman and child are going to be fundamentally changed by this technology, then the people of this country must make the decisions about AI and not just a handful of oligarchs,” Sanders said Tuesday.

Senate Republicans advance farm bill with McConnell’s return

Measure faces challenges as Democrats demand changes to SNAP

BY JARRELL DILLARD

Senate Republicans managed to advance a farm bill with Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Kentucky) returning to break the deadlock on the Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee.

The panel voted 12-11 along party lines to send the bill, which sets national policy for agriculture and nutrition, to the full Senate.

The bill still faces significant hurdles as Democrats remain opposed, particularly because they say it does not adequately address changes to the Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program that would make states take on more of the costs.

The bill requires 60 votes to advance in the full chamber, so it would need some bipartisan support. The current farm bill expires at the end of September, but a majority of the funding for programs in the bill will not run out until the end of the year.

McConnell returned to the Senate this week after being absent since he was hospitalized in June after what his office said was a fall.

Republicans were unable to advance some key legislation out of the Appropriations and Agriculture committees during McConnell’s absence because of Democratic opposition. Without McConnell, the panels were evenly split between Democrats and Republicans, leaving them deadlocked.

Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-Kentucky) this week returned to Capitol Hill.

3 dead after crash of L.A. news helicopter

The crew were covering a deadly collision of an SUV and a city bus

BY AOIFE WALSH

Three people were killed and two were hospitalized after an NBC news helicopter crashed in Los Angeles on Tuesday evening. NBC Los Angeles identified the helicopter as NewsChopper 4, operated by Angel City Air and in the area providing aerial news coverage for NBC4 and Telemundo 52 on the deadly collision of an SUV and a city bus. The helicopter crash happened just before 7 p.m. between two commercial buildings in the neighborhood of Chatsworth, the Los Angeles Fire Department said. It resulted in a fire, which damaged four vehicles and two storage containers. Fire officials said three people were declared dead on the scene — two from inside the helicopter and one on the ground — and two others were taken to a hospital. NBC Los Angeles news anchor Colleen Williams tearfully confirmed on air that the station's helicopter was involved in the crash. “We’ve been piecing it together here. We knew it was a news chopper. We knew we’d lost contact with our people out there,” Williams said. “We’re going to take a couple of minutes to think about that, to process and to regroup.” Capt. Branden Silverman, a spokesperson for the Los Angeles Fire Department, told reporters one person killed had been outside the helicopter when it crashed. He said the helicopter was “fully” engulfed in fire when firefighters arrived and the fire had spread to several nearby vehicles. NBC Los Angeles identified the victims aboard the helicopter as Eliana Moreno, an aerial photojournalist, and pilot George Marciniw, both Angel City Air employees. The pair began flying together in 2023, NBC said. The third person who died has not been publicly identified. The crash the news crew was covering, in which an SUV had slammed into a city bus, killed at least two people and injured six others, according to fire officials. Speaking at a news conference, Los Angeles Mayor Karen Bass said five people were killed across both incidents, calling it a “heartbreaking night for our city.” NBC Los Angeles reporter Robert Kovacik was at the scene of the earlier collision and preparing to go on air when he saw a thick, black plume of smoke. “The LAFD and the LAPD quickly got in their cars and their vehicles, and so did we,” he said in an on-air report later that night. “When we arrived, the LAPD pushed us back. They pushed back bystanders, they pushed back the media,” he added. “Too dangerous, they said, for you to be here.” He said a witness was “so upset” by what they saw, they “had to be rushed to the hospital.” Zareh Sevanesian told NBC News he was driving nearby when he saw the helicopter’s descent. “As we were driving I looked over to my left,” he said. “I saw the helicopter — something didn’t look right.” The helicopter gradually lost altitude, he said. He pulled over near the crash as fire erupted. “It was one of the most violent fires I had ever seen,” Sevanesian said. Fire Battalion Chief Rico Gross said more than 70 firefighters, supported by the LAPD, responded to the incident. The National Transportation Safety Board is investigating and is expected to arrive on the scene Wednesday.

The House is heading home earlier than planned

BY ANNA LISS-ROY

House Speaker Mike Johnson (R-Louisiana) said Wednesday that he was canceling Thursday votes, allowing lawmakers to depart a day earlier than planned for a scheduled seven-week recess ahead of the midterms. GOP leadership had already shortened the chamber’s September schedule by two weeks at the beginning of the month. After Wednesday votes, House members are not slated to return until the second week of November, after elections that will determine control of the House next year. “The House has done its work,” Johnson told reporters. “It’s time for our members to go home to their districts and make their case to the American people.” House Minority Leader Hakeem Jeffries (D-New York) blasted the decision, saying the “American people deserve better” than a “do-nothing Republican Congress.” “Republicans have recklessly decided to cancel even more days in session and run out of town because they are terrified of taking votes that the American people are demanding,” Jeffries said in a statement. “They have no plan to lower costs, address AI safety or hold the out-of-control Trump administration accountable.” The Senate is scheduled to be in session next week and the following week before breaking for recess. The new House schedule means an effort to impeach Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth, introduced by Rep. Thomas Massie (R-Kentucky) on Tuesday, will probably be taken up when the House returns, Johnson said. He predicted the move would not succeed, calling it a “stunt.” “Secretary Hegseth has done an extraordinary job,” Johnson said. “We’re in the ... middle of international conflicts right now, and we should not be playing games with national security.” The House has been dealing with attendance issues and a shortage of must-pass legislation. But Johnson left open the possibility of calling members back before November. Democrats have been calling for the House to stay in session. Hours before Johnson’s announcement Wednesday, more than 100 House Democrats signed a letter demanding he cancel recess to allow for votes on legislation creating AI safeguards. “We should not leave town until something meaningful is done to slow down the pace of [AI] development,” Jeffries told reporters Wednesday morning, minutes before Johnson announced the change.

“The House has done its work,” House Speaker Mike Johnson (R-Louisiana) told reporters at the Capitol. “It’s time for our members to ... make their case to the American people.”

Arts venue has closed its doors for two years of renovations. What’s next?

How many people will lose jobs? What happens to JFK’s bronze bust?

BY JONATHAN EDWARDS AND AMY B WANG

The imposing doors of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts are officially closed to the public one day after the center’s board of trustees voted to shut down the venue for at least two years of renovations. The performing arts center, which has stood as the nation’s “artistic mecca” for more than half a century, has been beset by snowballing financial and legal troubles after President Donald Trump and his allies took over its stewardship last year.

Here’s what we know about the center’s future and its programming:

When will the center actually close?

The Kennedy Center closed Tuesday, after a chaotic day in which a federal judge again barred Trump from putting his name back on the building and after its board of trustees voted to immediately close the venue for renovations.

Outside, digital signs that typically advertise upcoming performances instead flashed a red “Emergency alert” announcing the building was closed to the public. Guards stood at the doors. On Wednesday, fencing was erected around the building.

How long will the closure last?

Trump and his allies have publicly argued that the main Kennedy Center building must close for safety reasons and undergo a two-year, $250 million renovation. Material prepared for the Kennedy Center board Tuesday states that the center will “ramp up programming in a revitalized main building in 2028,” though an exact timeline remains unclear.

Trump also has said he will not allow renovations to the Kennedy Center to start unless he can put his name on the building and hinted that he is willing to take his fight to the Supreme Court.

While the main building is closed, some Kennedy Center programming will continue at the Reach, the center’s expansion that opened in 2019, as well as other venues.

The Kennedy Center has not answered questions from The Washington Post about the length of this closure.

Could this closure be halted by a judge again?

Possibly. Rep. Joyce Beatty

Singer Laufey rehearses with the National Symphony Orchestra at the Kennedy Center in 2023.

(D-Ohio), an ex officio member of the Kennedy Center board who has challenged Trump’s efforts to remake the institution, filed a motion Wednesday requesting an emergency hearing, arguing that Trump’s allies had violated a court order by closing the center without a judge’s approval.

What is Trump saying about the closure?

In a social media post Tuesday, Trump wrote that although the Kennedy Center closure would take place immediately, its renovation “cannot begin until such time as the D.C. Circuit rules on the Board’s approved name,” referring to his efforts to put his name on the building.

“If the ruling is a negative one, which it should not be, and is not overturned by the U.S. Supreme Court, the Reconstruction and the Renovation of The Kennedy Center will not take place,” Trump added.

Trump also claimed in the post that the $17 million he raised has been placed in a Kennedy Center account to “keep it afloat.” It was unclear how long the money would support operations or how it would be used. The White House did not immediately respond to requests for comment Wednesday.

Privately, the president has been furious at those who have blocked his plans. In a virtual board meeting that preceded Tuesday’s vote, Trump allegedly traded personal criticisms with Beatty.

The president accused her of obstructing efforts to repair the center, told her she had never built anything and said she was making a living by hurting the institution, according to two people who listened to the meeting and spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss it publicly.

Beatty responded that she found Trump’s conduct “highly unprofessional” and that he had caused “extreme harm.” She insisted she supported renovating the center but opposed tying the work to putting Trump’s name on the building. At points, the two talked over each other.

“The president threw a tantrum,” Beatty told CNN Tuesday night.

What renovations are expected to take place?

Spaces across the Kennedy Center including its three major theaters — the Concert Hall, Opera House and Eisenhower Theater — are set to undergo $250 million in structural renovations and cosmetic improvements, according to more than 160 pages of plans assembled by the real estate company JLL and presented to the board of trustees last month.

Many other projects seek to address behind-the-scenes repairs, including replacing much of the plumbing system, which officials say has not been updated in half a century. The plans also call for waterproofing the building; making repairs to the parking garage; and upgrading the electrical, heating and cooling systems.

Other, more visible changes include refreshing public spaces, such as the Grand Foyer, Hall of Nations and Hall of States, by replacing carpeting and draperies, and conserving artwork.

What do we know about the center’s financial situation?

Ticket sales and fundraising collapsed after the Kennedy Center board, stacked with Trump loyalists, voted last year to rename it “The Donald J. Trump and The John F. Kennedy Memorial Center for the Performing Arts.” Earlier this year, the center’s own financial projections showed the venue was on track to fall nearly $100 million short of its revenue target.

The center had budgeted about $220 million in revenue for fiscal 2026, which began in October and ends Sept. 30. By late May, officials projected it would bring in only about $124 million.

Officials cut projected expenses by roughly a third, but even that was not enough. The center still projected a $23 million deficit. The cuts involved slashing staff and programs, which the center said in court filings influenced the decision to close for repairs.

Trump and his allies have argued they inherited a troubled institution, and the president has taken credit for $257 million Congress appropriated last year for repairs.

Though the center had warned of impending bankruptcy, when questioned Tuesday by U.S. District Judge Christopher Cooper, Justice Department lawyers were unable to say whether the arts venue was eligible to declare bankruptcy.

What will happen to the bust of John F. Kennedy?

An eight-foot tall,

3,000-pound bronze bust of the former president, which has greeted visitors in the Grand Foyer since its opening in 1971, will be temporarily relocated to the Reach and available for public viewing, according to the resolution passed by the Kennedy Center board Tuesday.

How many people will lose their jobs?

It remains unclear how many people will lose their jobs. According to recent tax filings, the center employed 2,494 people in 2023, including artists, programmers, administrative staff and hospitality workers. In a pandemic-era statement, the center said it provided compensation to more than 1,000 guest artists each year.

The Kennedy Center already had conducted a round of layoffs in March, when Trump initially announced plans to shut down the center for renovations. Kennedy Center representatives did not respond to requests for comment Wednesday.

Where will the National Symphony Orchestra perform?

The National Symphony Orchestra, whose season begins this month, already had announced in August that it would hold its performances at six venues across the region instead of at the Kennedy Center, its home for more than half a century.

NSO leaders began scrambling to find alternative venues in February and March, amid growing uncertainty about the center’s future. The symphony has “always found open doors,” NSO music director Gianandrea Noseda told The Post last month.

From September to June 2027, the NSO will stage performances at Lisner Auditorium at George Washington University, the Lincoln Theatre on U Street NW, the Music Center at Strathmore in North Bethesda, George Mason University’s performing arts center in Fairfax, the Rachel M. Schlesinger Concert Hall in Alexandria and the Clarice Smith Performing Arts Center at the University of Maryland.

Will the Kennedy Center Honors and Mark Twain Prize continue?

The resolution passed by the board Tuesday stated that “signature artistic productions” by the Kennedy Center, including the Kennedy Center Honors and the Mark Twain Prize for American Humor, will continue at off-site venues. Details for those events have not been announced. The Kennedy Center Honors are typically held in December, while the Mark Twain Prize is usually awarded in June.

The rapidly escalating dispute has left the Kennedy Center caught between competing explanations for why it has closed and what happens next. Its Trump-led board voted Tuesday to immediately shutter the main building for roughly two years, saying urgent repairs were necessary to protect public safety. Center management said Wednesday that the current shutdown was instead a separate, temporary response to “imminent life-safety risks.” Trump, meanwhile, has said the renovation at the heart of the closure plan may not proceed at all if courts prevent the center from recognizing him.

The center remained closed to the public Wednesday after trustees voted Tuesday afternoon to shutter its main building “forthwith.” At about 4:30 p.m. Tuesday, a message played over the center’s speakers announcing the closure and security guards escorted visitors out through the Hall of Nations. By about 6 p.m., all of the doors were locked.

On Wednesday, fencing went up around the main building and security guards continued to turn away visitors.

But center management drew a distinction Wednesday between the closure already underway and the roughly two-year shutdown approved by trustees. Executive Director Matt Flocca told employees in an email Wednesday afternoon that he was closing the building to non-essential staff “effective immediately” for at least a week because of “imminent life-safety risks.”

Flocca said the temporary shutdown was separate from the board’s decision Tuesday. “It is a distinct decision by management to address imminent life-safety risks pending the Court’s ruling on that vote,” he wrote. The email did not explain why the center had already closed to the public about 24 hours earlier and remained inaccessible throughout Wednesday.

Among those shut out Wednesday was Janet Miller, 49, a longtime Kennedy Center patron and donor who often walks through the building during breaks from her nearby job, finding a quiet spot near the Reach or looking out from the Grand Foyer toward Virginia and Georgetown.

“This one really hits personally,” Miller said as she sat nearby at Tazza Cafe. “This is very violating.”

The public closure came hours after Cooper addressed the issue in court Tuesday morning. Although the proceeding was largely intended to deal with scheduling in Beatty’s lawsuit, the judge confronted a rapidly changing situation: Center management had recommended an immediate shutdown after a section of ceiling plaster fell about 60 feet into the Grand Foyer during a Sept. 4 storm, and trustees were preparing to vote on the proposal later Tuesday.

The proposed closure carried particular significance because Cooper had already blocked an earlier version of it.

In May, Cooper overturned a March board resolution to close the building, finding that trustees had acted on insufficient information and failed to adequately consider the consequences. But he did not prohibit the center from ever closing. Instead, while his order remains in place, he left trustees free to reconsider the issue after conducting a more thorough review.

Trustees returned to the question in August and approved a roughly two-year shutdown. On Tuesday, they went further, voting to make the closure immediate.

Center officials say new evidence made the acceleration necessary. During the Sept. 4 storm, according to the center, a roughly 4-by-5-foot section of plaster broke loose from the Grand Foyer ceiling. No one was injured. Inspectors subsequently found at least seven other areas with visible water-related deterioration.

Management has cited those findings, along with water intrusion into electrical areas, deteriorating parking-garage steel and aging mechanical and theatrical systems, in arguing that the building cannot safely remain occupied during construction. Center spokeswoman Roma Daravi said Tuesday that the board had demonstrated “a clear prioritization of safety above all else.”

Beatty’s lawyers have challenged that characterization. In a filing Monday, they said Delta Consulting Group, which reviewed the center’s renovation plans, had expressly disclaimed concluding that the building was “unsafe for continued occupancy.” They have accused center leaders of using long-standing maintenance problems to justify a closure the Trump-led board already wanted.

But Cooper made clear Tuesday that the center could not implement the board’s proposed two-year closure without first asking him to modify his existing order. Justice Department lawyer William Jankowski told Cooper that the government planned to file such a request by the end of the week. It had not done so by Wednesday evening.

Tuesday’s court hearing also produced a decisive ruling in a separate part of Beatty’s case. Cooper barred trustees from carrying out their Aug. 13 plan to add an inscription reading “Restored and Renovated by President Donald J. Trump” to the facade and rename the grounds “President Donald J. Trump Plaza.”

“Simply put, Defendants cannot install memorials for President Trump or anyone or anything else at the Kennedy Center without Congress’s blessing,” Cooper wrote, reiterating his May conclusion that Congress reserved the national memorial for honoring President John F. Kennedy.

News of Cooper’s ruling kicked off the board meeting minutes later. Beatty said in an MS NOW interview Tuesday night that Trump “went into a tantrum” and that the meeting devolved into personal attacks.

Trump called Beatty “dumb” and an “obstructionist,” according to the congresswoman, and at one point told her, “I think you’re incompetent.” Beatty said she responded, “I know you’re incompetent.”

“He was hollering and screaming,” Beatty said. “He was saying things like, ‘You’re holding up everything, you’re an obstructionist,’ and I said, ‘You’re holding up the country.’”

On Wednesday afternoon, the White House insulted Beatty and other Democrats, accusing them of allowing the Kennedy Center to deteriorate.

“President Trump stepped up to save it, and Trump-deranged Democrats like Joyce Beatty oppose anything that celebrates the greatness of our country because they put America Last,” spokesman Davis Ingle said in a statement.

Hours after the meeting, Trump tied the renovation directly to that legal fight. He said the building would close immediately but that construction “cannot begin until such time as the D.C. Circuit rules on the Board’s approved name.” If the center ultimately loses the naming dispute, including at the Supreme Court, Trump said, “the Reconstruction and the Renovation of The Kennedy Center will not take place.”

That leaves the Kennedy Center in an unusual position: Its main building is closed because management says an immediate shutdown is necessary for safety, while Trump says the two-year renovation at the heart of the closure plan may never proceed if the center loses the fight over his name.

DONG
YUYU

The upcoming summit between President Donald Trump and Chinese President Xi Jinping is an opportunity to secure the release of Dong Yuyu, a veteran Chinese journalist who has spent more than four years in prison.

Dong was detained in 2022 while having lunch with a Japanese diplomat and later convicted of espionage, a charge he denies. Press freedom advocates say his case reflects a broader crackdown on journalism in China, where routine contact between journalists and foreign diplomats can be treated as a national security offense.

Now 64, Dong was recently hospitalized after doctors discovered a fast-growing lung tumor that may be malignant, as well as an irregular heartbeat. His family is seeking his release on humanitarian grounds so he can receive the medical care he needs.

Dong has already spent more than four years in prison. The time has come to let him go home.

Battle with Trump is sending Canada into the arms of the E.U.

Head of bloc’s executive branch proposes associate membership

BY ELLEN FRANCIS

BRUSSELS — Locked in a trade war with President Donald Trump and pivoting away from the United States, Canada is seeking stronger ties in Europe and Asia as a shield against Washington’s volatility.

On Wednesday, sitting as a guest of honor inside the European Parliament, Canadian Prime Minister Mark Carney received an unprecedented offer: European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen said she wants to make Canada the first “associate member” of the 27-nation bloc.

“We want to bring the relationship with Canada to the highest level possible,” she said in her annual State of the Union address.

The declaration at the Parliament in Strasbourg, France, received a standing ovation from European lawmakers and from Carney.

The offer, which would see two longtime U.S. partners expand their alliance from trade to security, highlights the extent to which Trump is redefining alliances.

The president’s foreign policy gyrations, including threats to take Greenland from NATO ally Denmark, have triggered a reckoning among Washington’s traditional friends about their relationship with the United States.

Amid the standoff with Trump on tariffs, Canada has pursued a thaw in ties with China including new trade deals. Beijing has praised Ottawa for walking away from talks rather than caving to Trump’s demands, and this month, China and Canada revived a dialogue on military issues after an eight-year break.

Ahead of his trip to Europe this week, Carney said he wanted a “unique alliance” with the E.U., including on energy and critical minerals, to help safeguard Canada against economic coercion. “The world’s more dangerous and divided, and friends need to stick together in these times,” he said.

European leaders have echoed Canada’s bid to strengthen ties.

“Dear Mark, I said we must urgently reimagine our partnerships,” von der Leyen said in her speech. “So, I would like to work with you on opening the door for Canada to be the first associate member of the European Union.”

Von der Leyen described the move as “not against anyone else, but for our common strength.”

Yet America’s jilted allies are having once-unthinkable conversations about whether Washington could abandon or even turn against them, and are working to limit their dependence.

European leaders have vowed to take responsibility for their defenses as the U.S. shifts resources away and have rushed to close ranks with allies including Britain and Canada.

A new arrangement with Canada could involve visa-free work for Canadians in the 27 nations of the E.U., said two European diplomats, speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive diplomacy. Talks could include further reducing trade barriers and boosting joint arms production, they said.

Carney said Tuesday that visa-free opportunities are “one aspect of the discussion.”

In facing Trump’s tariffs and rhetoric about annexing Canada, Carney has cast himself as a leader who can rally together “middle powers” to protect their interests.

Trump has leveled personal attacks against Carney since trade talks between the North American neighbors collapsed last month. Carney retaliated against U.S. tariffs after rejecting U.S. demands that he said would undermine Canada’s sovereignty.

“What Carney has been saying to Europe, to Latin America, to Asia, is that now’s the time to stand up to Donald Trump,” said Fen Hampson, a professor of international affairs at Carleton University in Ottawa. “That’s his message: We’re gonna stand up, and if you guys have any guts, you’ll do the same thing.”

Carney, who has described Canada as “the most European non-European country,” has found a receptive audience in Europe. He is scheduled to give a speech at the European Parliament on Thursday.

But while European nations similarly stared down the barrel of Trump’s threats, E.U. leaders ultimately tabled retaliatory measures and agreed to a trade deal with higher tariffs to prevent a spiraling confrontation.

Valérie Hayer, a French lawmaker who leads a centrist faction in the European Parliament, told Carney on Wednesday that he has “shown what to do in the face of Trump: Refuse to compromise ... speak the language of power.”

“Canada is welcome in the European Union because we share the same values and our interests align,” Hayer added. “So let’s go further.”

Von der Leyen, who heads the E.U. executive branch, did not offer details on how associate membership for Canada would work or when it might occur.

Instead, she used her speech to tout plans for a deeper partnership on economic security, energy and technology, as well as in the Arctic. “We see the world with the same eyes,” von der Leyen said.

She said the two would build on their existing free trade agreement and “integrate” their defense industries.

Canada last year sent some 70 percent of its exports to the United States, which is also the E.U.’s largest export market for goods. Canada and Europe have sought access to new markets via deals with other trade partners, including in Latin America and Asia, amid Chinese competition and U.S. pressure.

Trade between the E.U. and Canada stood around $150 billion last year, while the U.S. and Canada traded more than $850 billion.

The E.U. and Canada, which have long sheltered under U.S. military guarantees, have pledged to ramp up their defenses and collaborate on upgrading their weapons industries. Like Canada, most E.U. countries are also members of the U.S.-led NATO alliance.

Canada this year became the first non-European country to join the E.U.’s 150-billion-euro loan program for joint weapons procurement, giving Canadian arms manufacturers access.

In a separate announcement this week, the European Parliament also said it plans to open a satellite office in Ottawa.

The status of associate member, proposed by von der Leyen, does not exist in the European Union, which oversees trade policy for its 27 member states and operates a single economic market based on the free movement of goods and people.

Creating such a category could complicate the E.U. setup with other nations such as Britain or Norway, and also potentially the membership bids of countries eager to join, such as Ukraine.

Joining the E.U. can be a years-long ordeal that requires thorny negotiations and legislative changes. Several nations on the continent have long been waiting in line, and the E.U. typically has not been flexible about membership rules.

Earlier this week, commenting on a Wall Street Journal report about E.U. associate membership, Carney said that Canada was “not looking to become a member” of the E.U. but was seeking an enhanced alliance.

“We share the same values,” Carney told reporters in Toronto. “We have the same priorities and we have very complementary strengths.”

Hampson said the key question is how the new relationship “is actually defined” and whether “it is just a new bow tied around existing agreements.”

“But if it does involve a much deeper and broader relationship than what we have now,” he added, “it will be significant.”

Beatriz Rios in Strasbourg contributed to this report.

SUDAN Death toll in mine collapse rises to 82

The death toll from the collapse of an informal gold mine in a remote area of Sudan has risen to 82, according to local officials and activists, as rescuers struggled on Wednesday to search for the missing with limited equipment.

Survivors said that the collapse happened at the al-Zara gold mine in Nuhud, a town in West Kordofan province, which is controlled by the paramilitary Rapid Support Forces. The group has been fighting against the Sudanese military for more than three years.

Suleiman Abu Hmeida, a member of the Emergency Response Rooms, said that rescuers pulled out 82 bodies by Wednesday afternoon. “But dozens remain unaccounted for,” Abu Hmeida told the Associated Press.

An official said that the collapse began on Sunday in one of the mine shafts and spread to the other interconnected shafts. He said that only one privately owned forklift is available for the rescue efforts, complicating the search for survivors.

The Sudan Doctors Network, a medical group tracking the war in Sudan, reported earlier that 67 bodies were pulled from the rubble, predicting that the death toll could increase as rescuers continued their search. The group said that the mine — an informal site that employs unregulated workers — lacked basic safety and protective measures.

KOSOVO Ex-president found guilty of war crimes

Hashim Thaci, the former president of Kosovo, was found guilty of war crimes, including murder, torture and illegal detention, by the Kosovo war crimes tribunal in The Hague on Wednesday.

Thaci, 58, was sentenced to 25 years in prison for crimes committed as top commander of the ethnic Albanian Kosovo Liberation Army during the territory’s violent break from Serbia in 1998 to 1999.

The ruling was closely watched in Kosovo and Serbia, where the legacy of the conflict and Kosovo’s later declaration of independence in 2008 remain a source of tension between ethnic Kosovo Albanians and Serbs. It was criticized as too harsh in Kosovo, while Thaci supporters briefly scuffled with police in The Hague.

The tribunal said Thaci was guilty of the murder of 96 political opponents and perceived collaborators with Serbian security forces by Kosovo Liberation Army forces during the conflict.

He was also convicted for the arbitrary illegal detention of 385 people, torture of 303 people and cruel treatment of 49 people. None of the victims were active participants in hostilities at the time the crimes were committed, the court added.

Thaci, who stood in silence as the judge read out the conviction and the sentence, had denied all charges.

The ruling comes at a difficult time for Kosovo, one of Europe’s poorest countries. Thaci’s conviction is expected to boost his political rival Albin Kurti but also fragment Kosovo’s already divided parliament.

SYRIA Parliament abolishes terrorism court

Syria’s parliament voted on Wednesday to abolish an Assad-era terrorism court and nullify the legal effects of its rulings, state-run al-Ikhabariya TV reported, in one of the first significant legislative moves by the country’s new assembly.

The Counter-Terrorism Court was established in 2012 as then-President Bashar al-Assad sought to suppress an uprising against his rule, and it was used to prosecute thousands of Syrians for terrorism-related offenses.

The move formalizes the court’s abolition after Syria’s new authorities had already treated it as defunct. In June 2025, President Ahmed al-Sharaa issued a decree dismissing 67 judges who had served in what he described at the time as the “abolished Counter-Terrorism Court.”

Syria’s March 2025 constitutional declaration had also called for abolishing the effects of what it described as unjust rulings issued by the court, including returning confiscated property.

The United Nations Human Rights Committee said in 2024 that the 2012 law establishing the court failed to adequately provide key judicial guarantees and raised concerns over arbitrary detention, torture or ill treatment, and the court’s independence. It also noted that the court was permitted to depart from ordinary procedures during prosecution and trial.

Wednesday’s vote came during the opening weeks of the first parliament formed since Assad was toppled in December 2024. The chamber convened for the first time in July.

British King Charles III took the unusual step on Wednesday of responding to criticism by the brother of his late first wife, Princess Diana, saying via a spokesperson that grief could affect reason, judgment and memory. The assertions relate to the now-monarch’s conduct in the days after Diana’s death in 1997. Her brother, Charles Spencer, alleges in a soon-to-be-published memoir that the then-Prince Charles told him “rest assured, we’ll forget her soon enough,” according to a report in the Daily Mail. Asked about the report, a Buckingham Palace spokesperson said: “His Majesty is mindful that the pain of fraternal grief can cloud reason, affect judgment and color memory in ways others do not recognize, even many years after such a loss.”

A court in Georgia sentenced its former security service chief to 13 years in prison on Wednesday on corruption charges, part of a broader crackdown on onetime senior officials in the ruling Georgian Dream party. Grigol Liliashvili, a former member of parliament who went on to lead the powerful State Security Service from 2019 until 2025, was arrested last December following raids on his home and those of a two-time former prime minister and an ex-prosecutor general. A court in Tbilisi found Liliashvili guilty of multiple cases of taking bribes, as well as benefiting from scam call centers run from inside Georgia, receiving $1.3 million in total, according to the prosecutor general’s office.

Netanyahu’s party tries to stop U.S. group helping Israelis return to vote

First national elections since Oct. 7, 2023, are seen as a referendum

BY LIOR SOROKA

TEL AVIV — Nirit Eylon has lived with her family in Australia for 20 years. But as Israelis prepare to hold their first national elections since the Hamas attack of Oct. 7, 2023, the tech innovator is heading home to vote.

“The country’s liberal values are currently under threat,” Eylon said. “It is important to me to see Israel get back on the right track.”

Tens of thousands of Israelis have left the country over the past three years. But Israel, with narrow exceptions for diplomats and civil servants, doesn’t allow voters to cast mail-in or absentee ballots from abroad.

So groups such as the America-Israel Democracy Coalition are helping Israelis in the United States, Europe and elsewhere return to vote.

The nonprofit’s Fly & Vote initiative isn’t financing trips, but it’s using technology to search travel platforms for low-cost commercial flights and arranging charters.

The vote on Oct. 27 is seen as a referendum Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, his right-wing coalition government and its conduct of Israel’s wars in the Gaza Strip and throughout the region.

Supporters say Netanyahu is a strong wartime leader capable of managing conflicts on multiple fronts. Critics blame his government for intelligence and security failures before Oct. 7 and say its policies since then have harmed Israel’s liberal democracy and international standing.

On Wednesday, Netanyahu’s Likud party filed an appeal against the Fly & Vote initiative with Israel’s Central Elections Committee, accusing it of operating illegally and violating campaign finance laws.

According to Likud, the America-Israel Democracy Coalition is a “political body attempting to influence the elections.”

The appeal indicates that Likud expects many of the expatriate voters to oppose Netanyahu and the government. But that’s not universally the case.

Shoula Romano-Horing, an attorney and political commentator based in Kansas City, Missouri, posted a video last week from the Western Wall in Jerusalem on X.

“I arrived in Israel to vote for the sixth time for the great and historic Prime Minister Netanyahu,” she says. “The leader who saved us from defeats on several fronts. ... He needs to be reelected to finish the job.”

Batell Blais-Sultanik, a co-founder of the America-Israel Democracy Coalition, said her group was working to make the election more inclusive. “Democracy only works when people show up,” Blais-Sultanik said. “It is a civic duty and a right.”

Experts say that Israel is an outlier among democracies for not permitting citizens to vote by absentee ballot or other remote means. Voting is allowed only in person, and on Election Day.

For some expats, that means returning now for the Jewish high holidays and staying until late next month to vote.

“Israel is one of the few democracies that does not allow its citizens to vote from abroad,” said Jonathan Barsade, who co-founded the AID Coalition in 2023 and serves as its president. “If we cannot bring the elections abroad, we will bring the Israelis living abroad to the elections.”

Barsade estimates that 800,000 to 1 million Israelis currently abroad are eligible to vote; half, he says, live in the United States. About 35,000 people have registered with the initiative.

Given a lack of polling and uncertainty about who will make the trip, the impact of the diaspora on the elections is unclear.

Transportation Minister Miri Regev, a Likud member, dismissed reports that her ministry was exploring ways to restrict charter flights ahead of the elections. Regev pledged to keep the skies open; right-wing voters, she said, are also planning to come.

Blais-Sultanik emphasized that the Fly & Vote initiative isn’t endorsing candidates or targeting specific political camps. “We don’t pick a side,” she said. “We back the right to vote.”

Roy Hasson Collier, 42, who lives in London with his husband and their 3-year-old son, planned to vote for a centrist candidate who he believes can defeat Netanyahu, Israel’s longest-serving prime minister.

“I feel Zionist, but that doesn’t mean I support this government,” he said. With a new government, he said, “I will feel more comfortable with my Israeliness, be prouder and feel that there is hope in the country.”

Israelis have long debated whether those living abroad should be allowed to vote.

In a 2016 position paper, the Israel Democracy Institute proposed accepting ballots from those who had left Israel no more than three years before the election. Yohanan Plesner, the institute’s president, said the proposal strikes a balance between making the vote more accessible and ensuring that those who participate are Israelis whose life is still centered here.

“We have a very large diaspora, about a million Israelis who live overseas, so if all of them get the right to exercise their vote that can have pretty dramatic consequences,” he said. “We’re a country that has unique security challenges, and decisions of a government have a direct effect on questions of war and peace and recruitment.”

Barsade and Blais-Sultanik believe overseas voting should be allowed for all.

“There is a very strong symbiotic connection between Israel and the diaspora,” said Barsade, who has lived in the United States for 35 years. “The average Israeli abroad opens an Israeli news website first thing in the morning. ...

“They cannot tell us, ‘Hey, you are Israelis when we need you, and not Israelis when it’s convenient for us,’” Barsade said, noting the diaspora’s support after Oct. 7. “Every single person should have this right preserved.”

Israelis living abroad emphasize that events in Israel have a direct impact on Israelis overseas.

“When a shot is fired somewhere in Israel, it is heard loud and clear in Berkeley as well,” said Offir Gutelzon, 51, a tech entrepreneur in Palo Alto, California.

“We constantly find ourselves busy explaining that we are not our government,” he said. “When there is a post by [National Security Minister Itamar] Ben Gvir with 17 million views saying we need to flatten Gaza or Lebanon, you have to explain that this is a minority, and it doesn’t represent the sane, liberal Israeli majority.”

Damage to key pipeline threatens to elevate crisis into broader oil disruption

GAS PRICES FROM AI

But analysts who reviewed images of the pipeline damage anticipate a significantly longer disruption, likely resulting in high prices for consumers well beyond the midterm elections. And maritime tracking organizations say that far less oil is getting through the Strait of Hormuz than the Trump administration claims.

Andrew Lipow, a consultant who advises clients on protecting and repairing oil infrastructure, said photos of the pipeline “show a significant amount of damage” and that repairs are likely to “take a month or two.”

“They will need to replace piping, valves, all the electrical stuff,” he said. “It is not like you can just go to Costco and pick that stuff up off-the-shelf.”

Satellite imagery reviewed by The Washington Post revealed damage to at least two pumping stations along the pipeline.

Drone attacks on one, beginning Thursday, were widely reported, and high-resolution imagery collected by Vantor on Sunday showed extensive and significant damage.

At least one other pumping station, about 130 miles east of the first, was also damaged around that time, according to a review of imagery by The Post. A plume of dark smoke, so large it could be seen from space, rose from the western side of the station in a Sept. 10 Planet satellite image.

Because of the shortage of crude oil and the damage the wars in the Middle East and Ukraine have inflicted on refineries that turn it into diesel and gasoline, market analysts are warning that fresh price shocks are about to hit motorists.

Tom Kloza, chief energy adviser for Gulf Oil, predicted on X that Wednesday would “see staggering increases at the pump for both gasoline & diesel.”

“Fuel margins have yet to catch up with previous wholesale hikes,” he wrote. “Watch for huge increases in Great Lakes and Rocky Mountain states in particular.”

“Buckle up,” Patrick De Haan, head of petroleum analysis at the price-tracking platform GasBuddy, wrote Wednesday morning. “Gas and diesel look set for a spike over the next 48 hours, hardest in parts of the nation’s interior.”

The national average price for regular gasoline stood at $4.37 on Wednesday, according to AAA, with a range of $6.04 in California to $3.75 in Indiana. That’s still below the all-time national record of $5.02 in June 2022. But diesel, which has a big influence on trucking and retail prices, has continued to hit records, with the national average at $6.31 on Wednesday. In California, diesel is averaging $8.27.

Gas prices are also shooting up particularly fast in the political battleground states of the Midwest, where rising crude prices have been compounded by a power outage at the Exxon-Mobil Joliet refinery near Chicago, which typically produces 11 million gallons of gasoline and diesel per day and is a crucial supplier for the region.

By early afternoon Wednesday, according to De Haan’s tracking of real-time data, the price for a gallon of regular had jumped by 30 cents from the day before in Lawrence County, Ohio, and Edwardsburg, Michigan. It was up 28 cents in Des Moines and 26 cents in Belmont County, Ohio.

He said diesel was on track to average $6.59 in Ohio and $6.79 in Michigan by the end of Wednesday.

The disruption to the global energy market has come largely as a result of retaliation by Iran and its proxies to U.S. strikes and economic warfare against Iran.

President Donald Trump launched Operation Epic Fury on Feb. 28, when U.S.-Israeli strikes killed Iranian supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. In recent weeks, Trump has looked to use a naval blockade and economic sanctions to punish Iran.

Instead of capitulating, Iran and its proxies are growing more aggressive.

Saudi Arabia blamed the pipeline damage on Iranian-backed militias in Iraq. Iran-backed Houthi rebels have also been escalating their attacks on Saudi oil infrastructure and have gained territory that gives Iran control over the Bab al-Mandab Strait.

On Wednesday, fighting between Saudi Arabia and the Houthis escalated even further, with the Houthis saying they had downed an F-15 plane and Saudi Arabia accusing the Houthis of firing a drone near the holy site of Mecca, which the Houthis denied.

Taking all that into account, market analyst forecasts are darkening.

“We noted that diesel prices could rise to $6.65/gal by election day based on trends five days ago. Well, trends have worsened — diesel surpassed $6.26/gal already,” Liz Thomas, chief market strategist for the banking and investment firm SoFi, posted on X.

Already, American motorists have paid an additional estimated $107 billion in extra gasoline and diesel costs as a result of the war that began with U.S. and Israeli strikes on Iran on Feb. 28.

The deteriorating outlook comes as the war nears its seven-month mark, with no end in sight and recent diplomatic efforts faltering.

Trump has tried to downplay the risk, saying over the week-end that “everything will work out just fine,” when asked about developments in Yemen that appeared to choke off Saudi Arabia’s remaining outlet for oil exports.

Prices in the U.S. are rising so fast that industry officials are bracing for potential intervention from the White House or Congress, which has few tools left to confront the spiraling costs. One of the remaining options would be an export ban on diesel, which could create chaos in global markets and not necessarily lower prices in the U.S., as domestic refineries are already running at capacity.

Senate Majority Leader John Thune (R-South Dakota) told reporters Tuesday that he is open to considering it. “We’ll be looking at any proposal that is a viable solution, but I do think if we have the supply in this country and we’re exporting it right now that might be one way of getting at it,” he said in response to a question, according to a report in Bloomberg News. “If that would take pressure off of prices, you know, I’m open to exploring it.”

Some economists immediately warned such a move would only worsen the energy crunch in the U.S. and abroad.

“The diesel problem is a refining capacity and crude quality problem layered on a war,” Tracy Shuchart, senior economist at the commodities trading platform NinjaTrader, posted on X. “An export ban addresses neither and makes both worse.”

The East-West pipeline has also exposed the limits of Washington’s effort to protect Gulf energy flows. Amid uncertainty around when the pipeline will open again, industry officials are bracing for even more attacks.

Analysts note there are several more vulnerable pumping stations along the pipeline route that could create even more chaos if damaged.

Visual analysis by The Post showed that a third oil facility, an Aramco bulk plant in Abha, a city in the southwest of the country, also appeared to have suffered damage last week. Video taken at a distance from the plant showed the plant on fire, and Planet satellite imagery from Sept. 8 showed a smoke pillar measuring at least 20 miles in length.

Aftermath imagery taken the following day showed at least six storage tanks appeared to have been impacted.

And while the pipeline has been the “headliner,” said Brett Erickson, geopolitical expert who sits on the board of Seton Hall’s School of Diplomacy and International Relations, the Iranian-backed Houthi rebels have been “hammering” other Saudi oil infrastructure.

On Wednesday, in the most recent example, the Houthis said they attacked Saudi Arabia’s Aramco facility in Yanbu with dozens of ballistic missiles and drones, causing large fires and destruction.

“What has become clear is the inability of Saudi Arabia to protect its infrastructure,” Erickson said, adding that satellite imagery shows that during the pipeline attack on Friday, it was not just one pumping station that was hit, but three.

“It is intentional that the Houthis and Iraqi militias have not struck the pipeline more,” he said. “Because the real death knell will be getting it repaired to 95 percent, then striking again. That is really where they become dangerous.”

Fire data from NASA’s Fire Information for Resource Management System also detected a flare on Wednesday over the Aramco refinery in the Red Sea port of Yanbu, where the East-West pipeline runs to, this week, but The Post was unable to verify what the cause of the flare was.

Bob McNally, who founded the research firm Rapidan Energy Group and was an energy adviser in the George W. Bush administration, predicted that Iran is going “to keep trying to raise the price of crude oil to pressure Trump to capitulate.”

He said the U.S. has made progress helping ships navigate through the Strait of Hormuz, despite constant threats of Iranian attacks. But that success has been offset by the potentially more enduring damage caused by attacks on oil infrastructure.

The East-West pipeline was a key factor in keeping fuel prices from soaring even higher than they did in the past several months. It was part of what McNally described as a three-legged stool that helped mitigate the economic damage from the halting of most shipping traffic through the Strait of Hormuz.

The other two legs of that stool were China cutting back its imports of oil substantially — easing the global shortage — and the U.S. and other countries tapping hundreds of millions of barrels of emergency reserves. Now, the reserves are mostly tapped out, China’s appetite for imported oil has come roaring back, and the pipeline has been knocked out of commission. At the same time, traffic through the Strait of Hormuz is far from restored to the level it was at before the war.

What a Fed rate hike means for your mortgage, car loan and more

The bank raised interest rates for the first time since 2023 in an effort to slow the economy and rein in stubborn inflation

BY RACHEL LERMAN

The Federal Reserve raised interest rates Wednesday for the first time since 2023, but that won't mean the mortgage rate or car loan you've been eyeing will suddenly shoot up.

Fed cuts are one piece of the puzzle in how banks determine loan rates and could contribute to a trend of interest rates slowly rising over time.

Here's what a rate cut means for your mortgage, car loan, savings account and more.

What does a Fed rate hike mean?

The Fed's action sets the federal funds rate, or the standard rate for how banks borrow money from each other. That means banks will need to consider charging customers a higher interest rate to still make a profit because they are paying more to borrow the money in the first place.

But that doesn't directly change what banks charge customers to borrow money for, say, small-business loans or car loans. The Fed's rates are short-term, and while it influences longer-term loan rates, it does not control them.

The amount of movement depends on the type of loan you're considering.

What does this mean for mortgages?

Mortgage rates probably won't spike immediately. At least, not in response to the rate hike.

Fixed-term mortgage rates are more influenced by Treasury bond yields, which are determined by investors' views of the economy as a whole.

Global bond yields have been soaring recently as investors grow concerned about rising government debt, geopolitical conflict, persistent inflation and whether central banks around the world will increase interest rates to try to bring costs down.

The 10-year Treasury yield, a benchmark that influences mortgage rates and other borrowing costs, briefly rose above 5 percent on Monday, the first time it hit that mark since 2023. Mortgage rates have risen significantly this year, hitting 6.76 percent on average for a 30-year fixed-rate loan last week.

That's in stark contrast to the drop analysts expected to see at the beginning of the year. But rising oil prices caused by the war in Iran have pushed up inflation and Treasury yields.

Those bond yields don't always match up with Fed rates; sometimes they run in the opposite direction. When the Fed cut rates late in 2024, Treasury yields — and mortgage rates — did not follow. Instead they rose, as investors worried about potential upcoming inflation.

Some of the recent bond yield spike was probably anticipation of the Fed raising rates.

People who already locked into a fixed-rate mortgage — which is by far the most common type of mortgage in the United States — won't see a change at all. That mortgage rate stays the same over the 30- or 15-year lifetime of the loan, unless the borrower refinances.

Fed rate changes often have a more direct effect on short-term loans, or loans with variable rates, such as adjustable-rate mortgages. Those rates can move up and down as the Fed's rate does.

Will car loans get costlier?

Car loans reflect a type of borrowing that may be partially but not directly influenced by the Fed's rate. Banks also look at what the Fed says about what could be coming ahead to set rates.

Auto rates are affected by many factors, including bond yields, the borrower's credit score and the number of recent delinquencies in a bank's portfolio.

Auto loan interest rates tend to be more responsive to the Fed than mortgage rates, with shorter-term loans matching the Fed's rate cuts more closely. But car loans are also sensitive to the market dynamics of the auto industry, so rates often stay high when many people are applying.

Lenders are still making auto loans, according to data from Cox Automotive. But rates are not going down.

"Auto loan rates tend to track the 10-year Treasury notes and longer-term market rates, and those have been moving higher lately," Jeremy Robb, chief economist at Cox Automotive, said in a note this week. "Auto loan rates are following."

The Fed rate hike would raise the average monthly payment by about $6, Robb wrote. But consumers may feel more strapped in other areas and be less likely to spend on a car.

What happens with credit cards and savings accounts?

Fed rate changes have a stronger influence on short-term interest rates, like those on credit cards or savings accounts. Interest rates on credit card debt may rise slightly in relation to a Fed rate cut. That could deal a blow to people who already carry a balance from one month to the next, especially with credit card debt near an all-time high.

But from a quarter-percent rate hike, the payment increase for each person should not be much, possibly a few dollars on average, said Ted Rossman, principal consumer finance analyst at Money Management International.

Still, the total increase in the past five years is noticeable.

"That starts to add up more," Rossman said.

On the other hand, the rate hike could mean that the interest rate you're making from holding funds in a high-yield savings account or a short-term CD also could rise, meaning your annual return might be a bit higher.

The big silver lining

The key reason for the Fed to raise rates at all is to try to slow the economy slightly and rein in persistent inflation.

Inflation has spiked this year after the U.S. and Israel attacked Iran, sending oil prices surging and making it more expensive for Americans to fill up their cars, buy groceries and purchase clothes.

The Fed's action is designed to help tame that inflation, which could slow increases for families and ideally abate some of the rising financial pressure. Raising interest rates can slow down borrowing from both businesses and consumers, and encourage people to save more. That in turn can help cool prices by reducing demand.

"I know a rate hike may feel like bitter medicine, but we need it because we can't just keep having this runaway price growth," Rossman said.

U.S. stocks slip after hints that more rate increases could be on the way

BY STAN CHOE
Associated Press

NEW YORK — U.S. stocks slipped Wednesday after the Federal Reserve hiked its main interest rate for the first time in three years and suggested more may be ahead as it tries to get the nation's high inflation under control.

The S&P 500 fell 0.4 percent after giving up a modest gain from earlier in the day. The Dow Jones Industrial Average dropped 631 points, or 1.2 percent, and the Nasdaq composite was nearly unchanged after edging down by less than 0.1 percent.

Investors generally prefer lower interest rates because higher rates slow the economy's growth and undercut prices for stocks and other investments.

The U.S. stock market initially held onto its modest, early gains after the Fed announced its decision. The short-term pain of a slower economy may be worth it if it starves inflation of its fuel and gets further increases for the cost of living back to the Fed's 2 percent target.

But stock prices weakened later in the day as Fed Chairman Kevin Warsh said repeatedly in a press conference that inflation remains too high and the U.S. economy appears to be strengthening. That could imply the economy is solid enough to withstand more hikes to rates, and other officials at the Fed provided their own forecasts suggesting rates may need to go still higher.

The median Fed official expects the federal funds rate to end this year at 4.1 percent, according to forecasts published after the central bank's meeting. That's up from its current range of 3.75 percent to 4 percent following Wednesday's increase, and it's up from the median forecast of 3.8 percent that Fed officials gave three months ago.

Traders, meanwhile, suspect the Fed may go even further. They're betting on a 38 percent probability the Fed could hike the federal funds rate to a range of 4.25 percent to 4.50 percent by the end of the year, according to data from CME Group.

"Our decision comes at a time when the American economy appears to be strengthening," Fed Chairman Kevin Warsh said in his press conference.

He pointed to solid U.S. hiring trends, corporate profits and investments by businesses. A report on Wednesday morning, meanwhile, showed shoppers spent much more at U.S. retailers last month than economists expected.

"The plain fact is that inflation is too high and has been for too long," Warsh said. He later added, "Today's action starts to show we're serious about this."

It's the first hike by the Fed to interest rates in three years. The central bank had been on pause for months following cuts to rates in 2024 and 2025, even though inflation has consistently remained above the Fed's 2 percent target.

President Donald Trump has been lobbying for interest rates to go lower rather than higher.

On Wall Street, bank stocks fell to some of the market's sharper losses. A slower U.S. economy could mean less demand for loans from them. Banks also get hurt when the gap narrows between short-term interest rates and longer-term ones because the industry makes profit off the difference.

Following the Fed's announcements, the two-year Treasury yield jumped to 4.74 percent from 4.67 percent late Tuesday. It tends to closely follow expectations for what the Fed will do with the federal funds rate.

The yield on the longer-term 10-year Treasury, meanwhile, takes into account expectations for economic growth and inflation years down the line. It had a more modest increase, ticking up to 5.01 percent from 5.00 percent late Tuesday.

Huntington Bancshares fell 5.6 percent, Citizens Financial Group sank 4.8 percent and JP-Morgan Chase slipped 1 percent.

The largest loss in the S&P 500 came from J.B. Hunt Transport Services, which lost 13.3 percent. Its chief financial officer told a conference of analysts late Tuesday that it's facing higher costs and expects its earnings to drop 5 percent to 10 percent from the second quarter to the third.

Stocks of oil companies also weighed on the market after the price for a barrel of Brent crude fell 2.7 percent to $105.83. It was the first drop of the week for Brent, which has gotten near $110 in recent days.

Helping to limit the market's losses were gains for some influential stocks in the artificial-intelligence industry.

Nvidia rose 0.8 percent, and Advanced Micro Devices climbed 1.6 percent to recover more of their losses from earlier in the week. AI stocks slid worldwide Monday after leaders of the AI industry called for a slowdown in development to address safety issues for humanity.

All told, the S&P 500 fell 33.92 points to 7,551.81. The Dow Jones Industrial Average dropped 631.21 to 51,461.90, and the Nasdaq composite slipped 3.15 to 25,978.42.

In stock markets abroad, indexes rose across much of Europe and Asia. South Korea's Kospi climbed 1.4 percent for one of the world's biggest gains.

Inflation is a worldwide problem, and the European Central Bank hiked rates last week to help diminish it.

Amazon to increase starting hourly wages

Online behemoth Amazon said it's increasing the minimum starting hourly wage for its U.S. full-time core operations employees, such as warehouse workers, by $1, to $20.

With the increase, the average wage will be nearly $24 an hour, with average total compensation of more than $32 an hour including the value of its benefits package, according to Amazon's announcement Wednesday. The pay increase will be effective starting Sept. 27, the retailer said. (Amazon founder Jeff Bezos owns The Washington Post.)

Amazon also said Wednesday that employees will receive new benefits, such as a 10 percent discount on eligible fresh groceries and everyday essentials from Amazon and Whole Foods Market online, as well as 20 percent off at Whole Foods physical stores. The discount can be combined with existing Prime member discounts, the retailer said.

The discount will be available to every Amazon employee in the United States starting Oct. 1, the company said.

RETAIL

Despite high gas prices, sales surge

Consumers may be griping about higher prices at the pump and elsewhere, but they keep spending, helping to power the economy, according to the latest government snapshot.

Retail sales rebounded at a better-than-expected 1.2 percent increase last month after recording a revised 0.5 percent dip in July, according to Commerce Department data released Wednesday. Economists were anticipating a 0.7 percent gain for the month, according to FactSet.

The decline in July was notable because there had been few signs of fatigue from U.S. consumers. Americans spent heavily during the World Cup and Amazon Prime Day sales this summer. That followed solid retail sales in April and May as Americans dipped into their government tax refunds.

Even excluding business at gas stations, retail sales rose 1.1 percent in August, underscoring the resilience of the American consumer. The government figures aren't adjusted for inflation. The roar back in spending is happening even as consumer confidence took another hit in July, according to the latest reading by the Conference Board.

The strong spending report comes as the Federal Reserve lifted its short-term interest rate Wednesday for the first time in three years to fight stubbornly high inflation. The quarter-point increase lifts the Fed's key rate to roughly 3.9 percent and, over time, could result in higher borrowing costs for mortgages, auto loans and credit cards.

MINING

Opponents look to block $50M grant

Opponents are going to court in hopes of blocking a controversial $50 million grant that

Michigan awarded in August to fund construction of a Canadian company's copper mine in the western Upper Peninsula.

The money was approved by the Michigan Strategic Fund after several failed attempts by economic developers and regional lawmakers to subsidize the Copperwood Mine project with taxpayer money.

Supporters have said the mine will boost the local economy over its 11-year lifespan. Critics point to the site's proximity to Lake Superior, the North Country Trail and Porcupine Mountain State Park.

The filing made Monday in Ingham County Circuit Court by the grassroots Protect the Porkies questions oversight of the public funding, with the $50 million coming from the also-controversial Strategic Outreach and Attraction Reserve (SOAR) fund.

The large-scale development fund has been defunded by lawmakers, who lost interest after the high-dollar spending yielded limited job growth and local backlash.

The money for the Copperwood award was authorized by lawmakers for an unnamed company in 2022. Other SOAR votes were promised to go through a public approval before lawmakers after the strategic fund vote.

But with the Copperwood award, the Michigan Economic Development Corporation said the funds went unused, making them available for the mine funding. State officials say the earlier appropriation means that the award faces no further approval by legislators.

THURSDAY OPINION

How red tape replaced common sense

BY PHILIP K. HOWARD

There’s a consensus among U.S. policymakers and public officials — an increasingly rare sight — that America is being suffocated by red tape.

“Abundance” advocates want to cut through zoning and permitting laws to build housing and infrastructure more quickly. Researchers such as Stanford professor Daniel Ho are using artificial intelligence to identify obsolete rules in the more than 3 billion words of legal code in the United States. And President Donald Trump, of course, brought in Elon Musk to wield the DOGE chainsaw.

But why does America have so much red tape? Society might work better if people understood what was expected of them and had room to use their judgment. The U.S. Constitution has 7,591 words. The difference between the modern red-tape state and the Constitution is operational philosophy. The Constitution is activated by officials taking responsibility to decide, for example, what determines “equal protection of the laws.” America’s thicket of rules, by contrast, is designed to replace human judgment.

Cutting through redundant and damaging regulations might help a little by, say, simplifying building codes, but not much. Eliminating 50 percent of red tape would still leave millions of words of legalese untouched. The failures of the regulatory state are primarily caused by the exclusion of human judgment, not by the scale of the legal code.

The red-tape model treats governing like an assembly line. The modern regulatory state was transformed into an instruction manual after the 1960s, telling people not only what to do but also exactly how to do it. Just input the facts and follow the legal labyrinth to the correct decision. In the late 20th century, common sense took a back seat and disputes proliferated as people unhappy with a decision litigated whether the procedures were meticulously followed.

The premise of automatic government was doomed from the start. People aren’t widgets. What’s fair to one group isn’t fair to another. Public choices usually require trade-offs. Do the benefits of offshore wind turbines outweigh destroying the scenic vista and harming ocean life? That’s a judgment call, not a matter of legal compliance.

The current crop of reformers puts its faith in a better “system.” But almost every choice requires judgment. I worked with Congress a few years ago to enact page and time limits for environmental reviews. It made little difference. Officials have been trained to avoid exercising judgment and to do only what is agreed upon by consensus. That’s why environmental reviews have degenerated into multiyear exercises of leaving no pebble unturned.

Governing isn’t nearly as hard as U.S. lawmakers have made it. Find anything being done effectively in the public realm — from running a good school to repairing a collapsed section of I-95 in Philadelphia in 12 days instead of five months — and you’ll see responsible officials acting on their best judgment. They are taking responsibility.

Letting officials exercise their best judgment, to the modern mind, is akin to lawlessness. That’s because human judgment can’t be dissected into objective parts. It is a black box — an amalgam of skills, instincts, values, biases — and unavoidably subjective. Judgment emerges out of the subconscious and then is altered by interactions with other people, who invariably see things somewhat differently. Healthy organizations, management theorist Mary Parker Follett found, are those in which participants are constantly improving their judgment by learning from one another.

The phobia against human judgment is America’s unspoken taboo. As a result, the American state is floundering. The evils of bureaucratic micromanagement include: inability to adapt to new circumstances (sluggish defense procurement), diversion to rule compliance instead of doing the job (doctors and nurses spend half their time on desk work), loss of a sense of individual agency and pride (why bother when drowning in law?) and listless public cultures.

This antihuman governing system helped spawn populism and elect a brash and often lawless president who promised to slash bureaucracy. But the cure to the red-tape state is neither autocratic diktats nor the pruning exercise promoted by abundance reformers. The cure is a legal framework, like the Constitution, that defines responsibilities, delineates the scope of authority and provides for accountability. Allow officials to fulfill their responsibilities by acting on their judgment, not trudging through a system of rote compliance. As James Madison said: that there should be the highest possible degree of responsibility in all the executive officers thereof”

In most contexts, the litmus test for effective law is whether the responsible person is free to act on this question: What’s the right thing to do here?

Liberating human responsibility is the precondition for individual accountability. Other officials can also check and balance decisions — for example, courts have authority to decide if an official has transgressed the boundaries of his authority.

Nothing complex in human affairs — not teaching, not health care, not managing a group of people — works without human judgment. Re-empower responsible officials to use their judgment, and billions of words of regulation could fall away like dry scales on a dead dinosaur.

THEODORE R. JOHNSON

The real reason Trump promised you $5,000

If the last 18 months are any guide, President Donald Trump is not going to send you $5,000. At last week’s two-night midterm convention in Dallas, he promised every adult citizen a “Trump dividend” should Republicans win both houses of Congress in November. It pushes his running tab of unpaid cash pledges past $13,000 per person. On the first night, he described the payout as a profit-sharing distribution: “because our country is making so much money.” During the second night, Trump morphed it into reparations for surviving Joe Biden’s presidency: “We went through hell.”

Congressional critiques of the plan were sharp, immediate and bipartisan. Rep. Ralph Norman (R-South Carolina) labeled it “pay-to-play politics” while Rep. Thomas Massie (R-Kentucky) called the idea insulting. Rep. Dan Goldman (D-New York) flagged it as corrupt and illegal, and Rep. Ted Lieu (D-California) mocked the gesture on social media with a counteroffer: “If Democrats flip the House and Senate everyone will get a $10,000 dividend, and a pony, and free ice cream for life.”

Given Trump’s track record of broken promises, the offer itself is the point, not the payout — and it’s aimed squarely at his base. Rather than a proposal meant to persuade midterm swing voters or flip those who lean Democratic, the “Trump dividend” mostly serves as a turnout incentive, gladly offering a payday for a vote on Election Tuesday. On the convention’s concluding night, Trump led the crowd in a pledge of allegiance — not to the United States, but to himself — followed by a vow to show up and vote. Then, as if aimed at his most religious supporters, he warned, “You know what happens if you don’t vote? You go to hell.”

This scene captures Trump’s theory of the presidency in his lame-duck years. Its first tenet: Turnout is the only thing that matters — not polls, not good governance, not inflation or war. Only turnout. His return to the White House was aided by getting more of his 2020 voters back to the polls in 2024 than Democrats did with their coalition, and it’s these same loyal, repeat MAGA voters who are most likely to show up for the midterms. And importantly, the theory holds that Trump, not the Republican Party, is the engine for turnout. He conceived of this first Republican midterm convention and used it to share his strategy for victory: “I’m asking you to pretend that I’m on the ballot.”

The second tenet is that patronage is a virtue, and everyone has a price, including voters. The Cabinet that opened Trump’s first term featured conventional, establishment Republicans. But the current version is mostly loyalists and deferential opportunists whose primary qualification is keeping the boss happy. When the exchange involves cash and voters rather than political appointments, though, it becomes presidential clientelism, in which payment is promised for partisan support. And even when the president lacks the authority to deliver, and voters have no recourse when he defaults, the promise of a sizable dividend is still somehow valuable to the faithful.

ALEX WONG/GETTY IMAGES

President Donald Trump at the Republican midterm convention on Sept. 10 in Dallas.

And the third tenet is that whatever happens, it’ll soon be someone else’s problem. If Republicans keep control of Congress and it authorizes payments, the estimated $1.3 trillion price tag — added to a national debt that just crossed $40 trillion — will be for a future president and Congress to address, not Trump. If he fails to provide the dividend — as with the proposed U.S. DOGE Service and tariff dividends last year — Republicans may pay a price, but Trump won’t. And if Democrats take control of Congress, Republicans might fall into disarray. Cabinet loyalists could be subpoenaed, but not Trump, already twice-impeached and now with court-granted immunity. He can promise anything, decide anything and isn’t on the hook to deliver or account for any of it.

For all Trump’s reneging, government dividends aren’t inherently bad policy. Alaska created a fund from leased-land income and revenue from oil companies, establishing a state-owned corporation to manage it. The popular fund has snowballed to nearly $88 billion and pays an annual dividend to every resident adult and child. This year it’s $1,000, plus a $200 bonus. But such proposals can also be politically disastrous if they are not thought through or are poorly designed: During the 1972 Democratic presidential primary, Sen. George McGovern (South Dakota) floated the idea of an annual tax-funded stipend, and it was pilloried by both sides of the aisle before being abandoned altogether.

Presidents making promises they can’t keep isn’t new; voters understand it comes with the territory. But Trump has made a name for himself by overpromising and underdelivering, embellishing plans and offering excuses rather than results. And he’s so shielded from accountability that it makes little difference to his lame-duck presidency whether voters take the bait, or whether he passes the buck. In this way, a $5,000 dividend is Trump’s ideal marketing promise — costs nothing to make and has the same odds of delivery as a snowball’s chance in hell.

A report exposed a crisis in academia. The response was telling.

BY DANIEL DIERMEIER

The surest sign that a diagnosis has struck a nerve is when the response confirms it.

A year ago, I partnered with the chancellor of Washington University in St. Louis to commission an independent committee of leading scholars — chaired by philosopher Paul Boghossian — to examine the state of the humanities and humanistic social sciences. We asked the committee to assess whether ideological commitments were eroding scholarly standards and distorting the objective pursuit of knowledge.

The committee’s central finding in its report released in June was nuanced. It emphasized the continued importance of the humanities and found rigorous scholarship in every field it studied. But the committee also found serious problems across the board, including “a deterioration in scholarly standards fueled by the substitution of political criteria for properly scholarly criteria in the assessment of research and a more general repudiation of long-standing ideals of rigor and objectivity.”

The group, however, noted uncertainty about how much these problems affect the disciplines, cautioning against hasty interventions without thorough assessments.

The reaction to this report has been lively. Some responses challenged its conceptual foundations. Some criticized its evidentiary basis and how it was produced. Others said it should have proposed more reform steps. That is how scholarly debate should work.

But others ascribed sinister motives to those involved or asserted that the report had been commissioned to advance a broader political agenda. A joint statement from members of the American Association of University Professors at Vanderbilt and Washington University called the document a “pseudo-intellectual pretext” for administrators to strip faculty of the power to govern their own departments and asked us to rescind the report. Others alleged guilt by association after the U.S. secretary of education cited it in an open letter in August — a letter published nearly a year after the report had been commissioned.

Ascribing motives without providing evidence or rejecting findings because they are also supported by political opponents are odd arguments to make when criticizing a report’s accuracy. Should one stop being concerned about student affordability just because the secretary of education mentioned similar concerns in her letter?

Some scholars have been refreshingly clear in embracing a political purpose for their scholarly activities. In the American Anthropologist, one scholar argued that the core academic value of anthropology “is not the pursuit of truth, because all truth is subjective,” and that its core value should instead be to serve the interests of those the discipline has harmed. And in July, the AAUP committed itself to political organizing when it made its first national political endorsement in its 110-year history by backing Abdul El-Sayed for the Democratic U.S. Senate primary in Michigan.

To get a better sense of the evidence provided, it is worthwhile reading the field-specific reports on literary studies, sociology and history. We can debate what evidence would convince us that scholarly standards are being subordinated to political agendas. But what do we make of the fact that professional associations and many departments explicitly endorse such goals?

Consider the following examples. The president of the American Anthropological Association told the group’s members in 2021 that anthropology’s “political project is to challenge the culturally dominant commonsense of capitalist consumerism.”

The president of the American Sociological Association in his 2021 presidential address called for an “emancipatory sociology” centered on white supremacy, colonialism, patriarchy and other determinants that traditional European and “white American sociologists” had omitted from their accounts.

The English department at Michigan State University states that its “teaching, scholarship, and service are explicitly committed to advancing equity and justice and questioning established power structures.” Twenty other English departments and programs identified in the appendices to the literary studies report issued similar statements.

I have long been concerned about the politicization of universities and a strong advocate of institutional neutrality: the principle that prevents universities from establishing an institutional orthodoxy that inhibits the freedom of faculty and students to reach their own conclusions.

Universities risk losing public trust when political dogma outweighs truth.

The report focused on research, but we have growing evidence that similar problems can be found in the classroom. Universities will not rebuild trust — now at 38 percent, down from 57 percent about a decade ago — by dismissing legitimate questions about their current practices.

So what is the right response? Action, grounded in principle. In June, our Board of Trust adopted a declaration of principles, affirming commitments to free inquiry, institutional neutrality, academic freedom and scholarly excellence as the guiding criteria for appointment, promotion and recognition.

But much of the important work belongs to the faculty. Standards are set and enforced in journals, on editorial boards, in peer review, and in hiring, tenure and promotion committees. Those are faculty-led institutions and activities, and faculty engagement is essential. Scholars evaluate what rigorous work requires — and they have a duty to speak up when work falls short.

There are encouraging signs. In sociology, scholars are engaged in a serious debate about the relationship between activism and scholarship.

That is the response this report deserves. It needs to be read and debated. And where it is right, faculty need to publicly support it — even if someone in Washington has said so, too.

Daniel Diermeier is the chancellor of Vanderbilt University.

Canadian Prime Minister Mark Carney greets European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen on Wednesday in Strasbourg, France.

CANADA, UNDERSTANDABLY, has no interest in becoming the 51st state, but becoming the honorary 28th member of the European Union would be foolhardy. On Wednesday, European Commission President Ursula von der Leyen invited Canada with great fanfare to become the bloc’s first “associate member.” The arrangement is intended to reorient Ottawa from Washington toward Brussels by integrating manufacturing, technology, security and energy. Details will be negotiated at a summit next month. Canadian Prime Minister Mark Carney has called for “middle powers” to band together against the United States. Out of spite for President Donald Trump, Carney is accelerating the decoupling of a trade bloc that has generated enormous prosperity for North America. Canadians, Americans and Mexicans will suffer from this rupture. The E.U. paints itself as the friendlier alternative to an erratic and protectionist U.S. But the E.U. has its own complicated relationship with free trade. The single market inside the bloc benefits the 27 member states, making the flow of goods easy and accessible. But the E.U. has protectionist tendencies outside the bloc, putting up barriers to trade and requiring all member states to negotiate their trade deals through Brussels. Has Canada considered the prospect that its relationship with Japan or Australia could be set by bureaucrats an ocean away? Canada’s ambassador-designate to the E.U., Jonathan Wilkinson, said his country would not agree to any deal that signs away sovereignty. But joining the bloc always comes with a price tag. Would creating a “tech alliance,” as von der Leyen suggested on Wednesday, require Canada to sign on to the E.U.’s restrictive General Data Protection Regulation or to implement a digital services tax? Carney paused such a tax three months after he took office. Last month, Icelanders voted down a referendum for their government to start talks about joining the E.U. The major concern was the possibility of euro-zone fishing quotas being forced on the island. That sector accounts for 40 percent of the country’s export revenue. The E.U. fancies itself a regulatory superpower. There is virtually no part of public policy that the bloc does not try to influence by issuing suffocating rules, almost always at the expense of national sovereignty. This has prompted political backlash, including the 2016 Brexit referendum. Carney’s willingness to align with von der Leyen reflects the degree to which Trump has alienated traditional allies. But time is a great healer. In this case, Canada and the U.S. are due for a reset in just over two years. A new president will take office in January 2029, and the disastrous results of tit-for-tat tariffs, if they continue, will be even more apparent on both sides of the border. By then, though, Canadians could find themselves firmly in the grip of Brussels bureaucrats.

There’s no erasing the Alligator Alcatraz stain

THE TRUMP ADMINISTRATION has long denied accusations that immigrant detainees have been subject to inhumane conditions while awaiting deportation proceedings. A report released this week by the Department of Homeland Security’s internal watchdog not only documents such abject cruelty but also shows how the administration refuses to acknowledge its duty to care for individuals in its custody. The report, produced by DHS’s Office of Inspector General and dated Sept. 11, focused on Alligator Alcatraz, the much-publicized detention facility built in the Florida Everglades. The site, which opened in July 2025 and closed in June, was operated by the state of Florida, but as the report emphasizes, it remained under the federal oversight authority of Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Details from the report are ugly. Inspectors discovered outdoor cages about the size of a phone booth that were used to hold detainees for up to nearly two hours. Facility staff claimed that detainees voluntarily used these “calming areas,” yet investigators found at least one instance in which they “may have been used as a disciplinary tool.” The report chastised the practice as “highly unconventional,” adding that it “does not align with standards for humane treatment.” Other details echo claims of poor conditions in other detention facilities. Detainees were housed in cramped areas, often with less than half of the 75 square feet required by federal standards for each person. The prisoners were also allowed outside their units for only a few hours each week. Investigators documented complaints among detainees about a lack of clean water. They also found that a freezer for storing perishable food was above the standard temperatures needed to prevent spoilage. The showers, which detainees were allowed to use only three times a week, were infested with bugs. A DHS spokesperson, in a statement to The Post, denied “any allegations of inhumane conditions” and said detention facilities are held to the same standards as those under previous administrations. Alex Lanfranconi, a spokesman for Florida Gov. Ron DeSantis (R), also rebuffed criticism. Regarding the small cages, he said, “While it adheres to all federal standards for criminal confinement, we’d make it even smaller if we could.” Keep in mind that detention for civil immigration cases is not meant to be punitive. Despite Lanfranconi’s claims that the Florida facility housed “violent criminal aliens,” the Miami Herald reported in April that a list of more than 700 detainees held there indicated that about two-thirds did not have criminal convictions. More than 250 had only immigration violations. In a written statement responding to the IG report, DHS officials suggested that the facility was not the agency’s responsibility. They said the agreement allowing Florida to perform immigration enforcement “does not give the federal government authority over the physical operations at any facility or over the state employees except to the extent they are performing the functions of an immigration officer.” That’s an elaborate way of passing the buck — by an administration that celebrated the Florida site’s opening last year. The president and top immigration officials even toured the facility. What a difference a year and an inspector general’s report make.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Rep. Robert Garcia (D-California) speaks to the media in June.

What Democrats should prioritize in Congress

Regarding the Sept. 13 front-page article “Democrats tee up raft of probes if they flip House”: If Democrats win control of the House and Senate in November — and I fervently hope they do — it will not be because voters want a raft of congressional investigations. There is no need to explore the abuses of executive power by the Trump administration, because we have all lived through it. The November election is an opportunity to restore respect for the norms that govern a healthy democracy. I don’t think most voters want revenge. They want a return to normalcy and a government that focuses on the economy and other issues that voters care about. Achieving those goals and blocking the excesses of the Trump administration would be the best revenge.

Ron Hutcheson, Washington

I cringed when I saw the headline for the Sept. 13 front-page article about the investigations Democrats are planning if they win in November. When are Democrats going to learn that they can’t win elections by basing their entire strategy on being against President Donald Trump? I don’t want a continuation of revenge politics. I want to protect the right to vote. I want Americans to be able to afford gas and groceries. I want more protections from the harms of environmental abuse, artificial intelligence and senseless, expensive wars. The list of ways that Congress could help us, the people, is extensive, and it doesn’t include being bogged down in endless investigations and attempted impeachments.

Ann Reed, Fairfax

In addition to the areas identified in The Post’s Sept. 13 front-page article as ripe for investigation if the Democrats take control of Congress, they should also explore whether the courts, agencies, current federal officeholders and state officials who support the concept of a unitary executive will continue to do so if a Democrat is elected president. The next Congress could give Democrats an opportunity to press it on whether that view is principled or conditioned on election results. This would definitely make for good politics, and possibly good government. The next chief executive will need to deal with the aftermath of the Trump presidency. They should also inherit the capacious view of executive power that Trump and his supporters have advocated.

The problem with ‘hacking’ health

I enjoyed the Sept. 10 news article “Why scientists are starting to worry popular supplements could harm the aging brain.” Because people use computers and phones so often, many people apply digital metaphors to other aspects of their lives. It is not uncommon to hear someone talking about “hacking” their biology through medical treatment or supplements — but the analogy is flawed. Compared with the human body, computers are quite simple in their engineering and behavior. Perturbations to their wiring and programming are not completely predictable, but at least when they go sideways, the failure modes are limited in number and in consequences. The human body is more like a rainforest ecosystem. Some changes to the tapestry of life are minor; loss of one species or a deficiency in one chemical in the body may have a negligible effect. Others are critical, and changes can ripple through the system in unforeseeable ways. Human beings are fortunate to have professionals who spend their lives attempting to understand these complex systems. In matters of health, we all benefit from sticking to the recommendations of experts, and particularly to the recommendations of our primary care physicians, who know us best.

The next step in fighting allergies

I read with great interest Michael J. Coren’s Sept. 9 Health column, “Schools should stop banning peanuts. Here’s what really keeps kids safe,” on evolving school-based strategies for managing peanut and other allergies. Protocols such as epinephrine access, allergen-free zones and staff training save lives, and schools deserve credit for taking these steps. But safety protocols are, by design, a response to a problem that hasn’t been solved. As the number of children with food allergies continues to climb, the questions should be not just how to protect kids from exposure, but also why so many of them suffer from allergies in the first place — and what it would take to change that. The answer lies outside the school building in basic and clinical research. Some of this work is already producing results. For example, Food and Drug Administration-approved immunotherapies now exist for people with multiple food allergies. But funding and public attention remain modest relative to the scale of the problem. It would be great to see more public investment in research that could give allergy sufferers hope that their condition may someday be cured.

To prevent an AI catastrophe, take a lesson from the aerospace industry

BY GEORGE WHITESIDES

On Saturday, the leaders of Anthropic, OpenAI and xAI came out in favor of slowing the development of frontier artificial intelligence models — the ones that experts are worried could pose a catastrophic risk to humanity. The key question is how to turn those words into action.

I spent my career in aerospace before coming to Congress, dealing with high-stakes missions that had life-or-death outcomes. In my old industry, a serious flight accident can trigger a safety stand-down: You temporarily stop flying or launching, study what happened, document what you will do to fly safely going forward and then return to flight.

That simple, tested process has made aviation and space launch much safer than when it started — and it can be used as a template for what the AI industry should do now.

The recent OpenAI incident — when a model broke out of its digital enclosure and essentially went rogue, mirroring escapes at other companies — has seized the world’s attention. In the days following that revelation, more information has surfaced that underscores the urgency of this moment.

In response, the frontier developers — OpenAI, Anthropic, Google, xAI, Meta and potentially a few others — should take a lesson from the aerospace industry by conducting a safety stand-down together and pausing work on their most advanced models for 30 days. This would not stop anyone’s access to current models. What stops is training the next frontier model and, above all, using AI systems to accelerate AI research on themselves. (The Washington Post has a content partnership with OpenAI.)

During those 30 days, the companies should work with independent experts appointed by the government to accomplish one goal: agree on red lines for existential risks and recursive self-improvement, and on mechanisms to monitor and verify. The objective would be a shared public statement about what none of the firms will build, and what must be true about a system’s controllability before any of them goes near it. How much of the research loop may run without a human monitoring it? What counts as a trip wire? What does “we can shut it off” mean, and who has tested that claim? And how do we check this against cheaters?

Each company has drawn its lines, but those lines differ. No outsider can verify them, and any lab can quietly change them. A common baseline that can be tightened as we learn but not loosened in secret would be a first for this industry.

President Donald Trump on Sunday criticized efforts to slow AI development, raising concerns about China. If we pause, doesn’t Beijing sprint?

BRENDAN SMIALOWSKI/AFP/GETTY IMAGES

OpenAI chief executive Sam Altman on Capitol Hill on June 3.

American labs should publicly invite their Chinese counterparts — DeepSeek, Moonshot and the rest — to pause for the same month. If they accept, they can be involved in the process when the red lines are created. If they decline, or accept and cheat, American development restarts on Day 31, and everyone will know why. A frontier training run can consume a small city’s worth of electricity. It is hard to hide. The planned summit between Trump and Chinese leader Xi Jinping on Sept. 24 might be a good opportunity to kick this off, but the United States can start the stand-down on its own.

The other objection to this plan is that a month is too short to matter. That is the point. A month is short enough to survive politics and long enough to prove that pacing is possible.

And the work doesn’t need to end on Day 30. Full rules may take longer than a month to write. The goal of the first month is a public first draft and a standing group to keep drafting. If the talks are working, the participants can extend discussions.

Stopping work on superintelligence is not likely to be mandated anytime soon by a Congress that has yet to enact a comprehensive AI law, and an unconstrained pause invites the race-with-China concern. A voluntary month-long safety stand-down, called for publicly by Congress to put antitrust lawyers at ease, asks the companies only to do together what OpenAI did alone in August, when it paused part of its training for two weeks.

Congress should use the same month to draft the thresholds and verification structure — independent auditors, government observers inside the labs — that turn voluntary red lines into law. The AI can hold a line for a month. Holding it for good is Congress’s job.

Some of the people building this technology put the odds of catastrophe somewhere between 1 in 100 and a coin flip. You would not board a plane that had those odds of survival.

The Senate polls lifting Democrats come with an asterisk

BY HENRY OLSEN

Recent Senate polls must have Democrats feeling giddy. Democrats are now leading in the RealClearPolitics polling average in every battleground race except Iowa, and even there, the three most recent polls have their candidate, Josh Turek, in front or tied. Polls also show Democrats or Democratic-backed independents tied or ahead in Nebraska and within a few points even in deep-red Kansas and South Dakota.

Too good to be true? Well, probably. But there unquestionably are serious warning signs for the GOP. Let’s do a deep dive.

Modern polling is more art than science. As data journalist G. Elliott Morris points out, all polls are models now. Since so few people answer calls from numbers they don’t recognize, polling samples are no longer representative of the full voting population. That forces pollsters to estimate what the electorate will look like and assign weights to fit their data into the model.

The problem with this is obvious: Those estimates are often off, and in close races that can matter a lot. YouGov, for example, is a well-regarded pollster, but it systematically overestimated the share of Democrats in the 2024 electorate, causing it to predict that Kamala Harris would win the popular vote by three percentage points and putting her ahead in five of the seven swing states. Famously, neither of those predictions came true.

Because of this, analysts and reporters should carefully check a pollster’s assumptions when they assess a poll. Unfortunately, virtually no one does this. The recent scandal involving a fake polling firm, Median Strategies, receiving coverage for a purported survey that it later admitted was fabricated is an extreme example of what can go wrong.

There’s no evidence that any of the Senate polls driving media coverage are fake. But it’s still a problem that many of those polls don’t release complete cross tabulations showing results for demographic subgroups or explain what the overall demographic makeup of the poll is. That makes it difficult to assess the expectations behind a pollster’s model.

Some that do show their work should raise eyebrows. The Abacus Data poll in Maine, for example, showed Sen. Susan Collins (R) ahead by one percentage point among all surveyed voters. But the pollster touted its finding among so-called likely voters, which had Democrat Troy Jackson up by nine points. That massive swing could easily be the result of an overestimation of the Democratic turnout edge.

Similarly, YouGov’s unweighted respondent pool is heavily Democratic in some states. Its Maine poll shows Harris voters outnumbering Trump ones by 22 percentage points, but Harris won the state by only seven points. Its Iowa poll shows Harris voters outnumbering Trump voters by eight points in a state that Trump won by 13. Weighting the responses to match the actual results is intended to address that, but it’s reasonable to ask whether such a big oversampling of Harris voters means it’s missing a key element of Republican support.

Other polls sidestep these questions by failing to release sufficient cross-tabulation data at all. Eight polls were released on the hotly contested Michigan Senate race in the past month, but many of those did not include full comprehensive cross tabulations in their reports. Without cross tabs, we don’t know how the pollsters are modeling the electorate.

So can Republicans carry on in confidence that election night will go better than the “skewed” polls suggest? Not so fast. Those surveys that do release detailed cross tabulations establish some trends that should worry, if not frighten, the GOP.

First, virtually every poll shows that Democrats are much more united behind their candidates than Republicans are. That’s to be expected when the GOP candidate — looking at you, Ken Paxton — is controversial. Five recent polls of the Texas Senate race that include cross tabulations by party put the scandal-plagued state attorney general’s support among Republicans at 84 percent on average, while James Talarico, his Democratic opponent, enjoys 93 percent support from Democrats. The same pattern appears in Ohio, where polls show Sen. Jon Husted winning only an average of 84 percent of Republicans, while former senator Sherrod Brown has 95 percent of Democrats.

Most polls releasing cross tabulations also show independents voting for the Democrat by large margins. The Texas polls show Talarico winning more than 50 percent of these voters, on average, while the two Ohio polls show Brown winning either 56 percent or 66 percent of them. Turek is leading among independents in each of the Iowa polls that have data for this demographic, as is Abdul El-Sayed in Michigan. It’s hard to win races even in deep-red states when you’re losing independents by large margins, especially if some of your partisan support is slipping away.

The polls also show a smaller number of Republicans in the overall electorate than in 2024. Some of that should be expected, as the backers of the party that does not control the White House tend to be more enthusiastic about voting in midterm elections. But these data are also reflected in general partisan-identification surveys since the last election, which show fewer people saying they are Republican and more saying they are Democratic. Registration data in competitive states such as Pennsylvania and North Carolina have also swung against the GOP.

The overall picture that emerges is a bit murky, it’s true, but it’s not a good one for Republicans. They have seven weeks to reengage their core supporters and recoup some support among independents. If they can do that — raising GOP support in key races to 90 percent or more while winning close to 40 percent of the independent vote — the strongly Republican character of most of these states should allow the party to narrowly retain Senate control. Miss on either target, however, and the turbid waters become crystal clear — and deeply blue — come November.

South Carolina has an alternative to Darline Graham

KIAWAH ISLAND, S.C.

This state’s residents can be droll about their ample self-regard, as when they say: By flowing into Charleston Harbor, the Ashley and Cooper rivers create the Atlantic Ocean. In November, South Carolinians’ choice of their next U.S. senator will indicate whether their pride about their independence still endures.

They threatened secession in 1828 over what they called Washington’s “tariff of abominations” that raised the price of imports and threatened their export-based agricultural economy. In 1860, this was the first state to vote for secession. The Civil War’s first shots were fired here. This year, South Carolinians can demonstrate political independence by electing Democrat Annie Andrews. She is a 45-year-old mother of three and a pediatrician who likes children and wants to be in the U.S. Senate.

When Republican Sen. Lindsey Graham died in July, the governor appointed his sister, Darline Graham, to finish his term. When she decided to seek the Republican nomination for a full term, President Donald Trump endorsed her, so she won the primary despite a cringeworthy debate performance. Asked about Taiwan, she said: “I’m not that informed on national security.”

Andrews has graduated from medical school, so she knows what it is to know things, and how dangerous it can be to get things wrong. She is not a political rookie, having unsuccessfully run for Congress in 2022. She pleases her party’s base by being displeased with pharmaceutical companies, and what she considers insufficiently severe taxation of the wealthy. (The top 10 percent of earners pay 70 percent of federal income taxes.)

In this year of an inconclusive war, a soaring deficit and stubborn inflation, many Republican candidates seem most worried about transgender matters. Graham, emulating the rhetorical style of her presidential patron, wrote in a Fox News op-ed that Andrews is “the worst pediatrician in the country” because she “supports turning confused little boys into little girls and vice versa.” Andrews, who opposes gender surgery on minors, says such surgery has never occurred in South Carolina.

Graham also said, “I believe boys have no place in girls’ sports.” In the context of her Fox screed, this falsely suggested that Andrews disagrees.

Graham seems oblivious of what the Constitution’s Framers intended when they stipulated that a senator must be at least 30, five years older than a member of the House of Representatives. This, and six-year terms, and selection (until 1913) by state legislators, were provisions intended to increase the probability that senators would be mature, and insulated from transitory gusts of public opinion. The Framers wanted to encourage senatorial independence, buttressing the separation of powers by encouraging the legislative branch to counterbalance the executive.

Graham promises she will not be senatorial, as the Framers understood that adjective. She expresses unshakable faith in Trump’s Iran war, his tariffs and everything else: “I will have President Trump’s back 100 percent.”

So, of course Graham wants all illegal immigrants deported “immediately.” Her state might immediately miss a significant portion of its immigrant population, which makes up 6 percent of South Carolinians, accounts for 7.7 percent of the state’s labor force and pays $3.5 billion in state taxes.

South Carolinians’ choice of their next U.S. senator will indicate whether their pride about their independence still endures.

Thanks partly to Charleston’s busy port, South Carolina now has a manufacturing economy, many of whose products are exported. The president’s tariff fixation provokes other nations’ retaliations, disrupts trade flows and injures this state. Volvo, Mercedes and BMW are among the more than 1,100 international operations in the state. Five foreign tire companies producing more than 100,000 tires a day in South Carolina account for almost a third of all U.S. tire exports.

South Carolina is as red as the cheeks of a blushing Senate candidate should be when the candidate promises to serve passively as an enabler of presidential whims. No Democratic Senate candidate in South Carolina has come within eight points of winning in this century.

By taking Lindsey Graham’s sister away from her admirable work advocating for people with disabilities, the president is proclaiming that he can do whatever wants. And he expresses a disdain for the Senate, as well as for South Carolina.

Today’s president, like many of his predecessors, but more than any, aggrandizes his power by maximizing the abject subordination of his entire party. It is perhaps too much to hope that today’s South Carolina might spurn a Senate candidate too servile to secede from Donald Trump’s domination. Still, come November, hope for evidence that South Carolina, which historically has been so truculent about its independence, has actually exercised it.

Film about Elon Musk is engrossing and terrifying

BY TRAVIS M. ANDREWS

TORONTO — Nearly four hours with Elon Musk.

That's Alex Gibney's proposal. The filmmaker, once described by Esquire as "becoming the most important documentarian of our time," has tackled Enron, Eliot Spitzer, Vladimir Putin and Elizabeth Holmes. Now, he's turned his eyes to the richest man in the history of the world.

The 3-hour-and-45-minute "Musk" (plus a 10-minute intermission) hits theaters on Oct. 16, but it's already causing a stir.

The documentary, which spans from his early Silicon Valley days through his Department of Government Efficiency (DOGE) dalliances and Twitter acquisition to his ascent to becoming the world's first trillionaire, paints Musk as an emotionally unstable grifter with more power and influence than perhaps any other human who has ever lived.

Gibney pulls no punches, neither in the documentary nor in interviews about it, in which he's called Musk's power and influence "extremely dangerous to world democracy."

"What I discovered was that the story of Musk was not a new tech story," Gibney told reporters in a news conference at the Venice Film Fest earlier this month, adding that it's "really the story of an old wine in a new bottle. His story turns out to be the story of the confidence man, the stock pumper. His wealth and power comes from inflated stock, and so I had told that story before with Enron and with Elizabeth Holmes, and so it was a story that was oddly familiar to me."

As you might expect, Musk is not exactly flattered by the depiction.

"Gibney just assembled a hit list of people who either have an axe to grind or don't even know me (but still have an axe to grind)," he tweeted last week. "He has ZERO integrity. Horrible human."

An appetite for fashion, not food

AND SHANE O'NEILL
IN NEW YORK

We were invited to breakfast at designer Adam Lippes's Central Park-adjacent Gilded Age salon, a New York Fashion Week preview of his spring collection. To the left: black and white beaded gowns with a backdrop of tapestries and towering floral arrangements.

To the right: an array of honeycomb, figs, melon, miniature quiche, pain au chocolat, and petite toasts with scrambled egg and caviar, which everyone in the room was politely ignoring.

There is often food at Fashion Week. And very few people eat it, for all the reasons one might expect: not wanting to mess up their lipstick. Squeezed, sausage-like, into a tight dress. Scared of crumbs or stains. GLP-1s. Would rather be caught dead than have someone witness them consuming calories.

But someone's gotta take one for the team. So we pluck an Adam Lippes-branded paper coffee cup from a nearby tray and fill it with brew from a silver samovar. Tough job, we know.

"Oh good, you're getting a coffee," says Ava Jahant, a publicist for the fashion

Laying bare the truths of Sweeney's salacious ad

BY MONICA HESSE

Sometimes choosing story targets in journalism is about making calculations about what readers will actually click on. Case in point: Would you rather hear about an incredibly beautiful naked woman, or would you rather hear about a lady with poop running down her legs? Sydney Sweeney it is.

A sports-betting ad campaign starring a mostly nude Sweeney has gained a lot of attention this week, for reasons that are already apparent to you based on the first half of the sentence. Sweeney is an American actress best known in the cinematic world for her role on "Euphoria," best known in the marketing world for already starring in one controversial ad campaign, and best known in the physical realm for possessing what can only be described as a truly stunning chest.

Last year I went into a screening of "The Housemaid" not understanding why people were obsessed with her, and then there was a naked scene and I understood better than I have ever understood anything in my life. After the movie, three complete strangers and I bonded together over the brassiere lore that girls learn in junior high — the pencil test — and how it all suddenly made sense to us now, after seeing Sydney Sweeney take off her shirt.

This was a few months after Sweeney's American Eagle ad campaign that some saw as racially coded (it was a pun on "genes" and "jeans"); we live in incredibly interesting times.

All of this is necessary backstory to understanding what happened with the gambling site Novig's new "Just Sports" video. Sweeney, who is an equity holder in Novig, appears in the video with sporting equipment carefully arranged to shield her otherwise naked body. She straddles a strategically placed basketball net. Footballs cover her footballs.

People often don’t, she explains. And they graze very lightly on the food, which came from a boutique caterer called Chichi Eats. It’s a gorgeous spread, befitting of a Dutch still-life painting. The figs have been arranged in a perfect pyramid, and the most luscious grapes we’ve ever seen are stacked on a three-tier pyramid. A server is making sure that the caviar eggs are arranged in a precise grid. Everything is served on a silver platter.

Jahant has a theory: “It’s such a beautiful display that I’m not sure anyone wants to mess it up,” she says. Their loss, because it’s quite good: “We care just as much about the taste and quality of our food as we do about the aesthetics,” says a Chichi spokeswoman via email.

By now, a few brave souls have tried the caviar eggs — an ideal bite because of the small size. One beautiful man plucks a single piece of watermelon from a tray. But, fear not, hungry fashionistas: There is a solution.

“Luckily, we have these goodie bags so that people can take items to go,” says Jahant. “We usually offer that towards the end if there’s a lot left.”

We have to head to our next show, so we pluck a mini mushroom quiche and a pain au chocolat and make a bag. We devour it on the way to the subway — crumbs and flakes everywhere. Lipstick on the coffee cup. Maybe there’s a good reason not to eat at shows.

Fly, my pretties

Walking into Rachel Comey at the Judson Memorial Church, we’re presented with the most colorful patisserie spread we’ve ever seen. Tiny one-bite desserts in brilliant blues, greens, and purples, plated on tiny square mirrors. They’re so beautiful and so curious — those bright hues! — that people can’t help but grab a bite. (“Please don’t take the mirrors,” a server informs one guest, who thinks they are plates.)

Of course, we have to try them all. A silver-framed menu lists the delicacies: One is a chocolate coconut bar with blue spirulina whipped coconut cream and silver sugar pearls. A banana and activated charcoal muffin with ube cream and a silver pretzel. A chantilly cream chou with pink craquelin and milk chocolate gems. They were created by Alice Malaret, a food designer who has also created treats for Louis Vuitton, Bottega Veneta, Miu Miu and Mugler.

“I’m gonna keep going,” says one impeccably dressed man, speaking to no one, or perhaps himself. He took a chou. “The fashion girls don’t eat. I’m eating.”

Over at Alice + Olivia, where the collection is fairytale-inspired, models are posing with giant confections of truly inedible food. A human-sized sculpted prop ice cream cone. Raspberries and cherries the size of soccer balls. A waffle, casually leaning against the wall. sign that says “Eat Me” for the full Lewis Carroll effect.

We have to ask a server: Uh, are there drugs in these? No THC, he replies. “It gives you a slight mood boost effect, but nothing serious.”

But what of the rest?

Perhaps you have already zipped down to the comments, fingers tingling, ready to type: How can fashion shows have so much food that no one eats, while so many people in the world go hungry?

Yes. It is horrible. So much in this industry — in this city, in this country, in this world — is a compounding injustice. If we, personally, could give all of the fashion food to the hungry, we would.

And thankfully, some designers do! Last season, Talia Abbe set out 200 tea sandwiches for her presentation, many of which went uneaten. “We ended up actually donating a bunch,” she says — and this year, to prevent waste, the passed trays of truffle French fries were made on demand at her presentation, which took place in the restaurant Serendipity 3.

Content creator David Ross Lawn, holding a purse shaped like a toad, is unafraid to nosh in front of the fashion grrrls. There’s not a lot of time to grab a bite between shows when you have a packed fashion week.

“I think we should fuel our bodies and take care of ourselves,” he says.

Which is why Abbe always serves food: “People are running all over the city,” she says. A snack “gives people a reason to like, take a deep breath and settle down for a second.” (And linger over Abbe’s whimsical clothes, which include inflatable skirts.)

Still, as we munched on our fries, we watched other content creators pose with the restaurant’s famous frozen hot chocolate and pretend to take a sip — but then abandon their treat as soon as the cameras were down. We consider a pun about how that’s in poor taste.

Ate and left no crumbs

The fashion has been serving. But we’re done with snacks: We want a full meal. So for that, we head to Shao’s presentation at Chinese Tuxedo. Guests are seated in the basement dining room, where they happily devour complimentary spicy cucumbers, marinated wood ear mushrooms, pork dumplings and Shanghaiese vegetarian spring rolls.

Serving food isn’t just about fueling her guests, says designer Shao Yang. It “adds to the narrative of the storytelling.”

The collection was “inspired by ’90s Hong Kong Triad films,” she says, “and they always take place in a restaurant, all of the fight scenes.”

As we ate, models in severe suiting and low-cut dresses drift in slowly, eventually sitting at a large round table where they pantomimed conversation while smoking unlit cigarettes. There were plenty of clean plates. Servers brought second helpings.

Usually, says guest Stella Evans, a stylist, “It’s cute waiters walking around with little bites. It was nice to sit down and eat.”

The issue with Sweeney’s ad — if there is one — is not that she posed naked

SCREENS FROM B1

She is interested in just sports, you see. Not clothes, not safety precautions, not even rope burn on her batingo, apparently. Just sports.

Actual female athletes hated the campaign. They’re out there fighting for the right to wear wedgie-free leotards or play beach handball in something other than Baywatch costumes, and Sydney Sweeney seemed to be encouraging the idea that the best protection for a female hockey goalie is a pair of tighty-whities.

“idk what Sydney Sweeney was doing, but this is what a woman in sports looks like,” former NCAA gymnast Gracie Kramer wrote on social media, accompanying a supercut of herself flipping, running, boxing, and playing soccer and baseball.

Sweeney responded with her own Instagram story, which is no longer available for viewing but which apparently showed a compilation of professional athletes who have posed in the nude for editorial photo spreads.

There was another minor kerfuffle related to female athletes this past week, when endurance competitor Joanna Wietrzyk was photographed at a Hyrox competition in a state of distress.

(Ha, I tricked you: It’s poop time.)

Wietrzyk was competing in an event that alternated eight 1-kilometer runs with eight different high-impact exercise stations. Midway through the fourth station, burpee broad jumps, Wietrzyk apparently lost control of her bowels. She completed the grueling race with visible streaks of feces running down her legs.

Public opinion was immediately divided. Should Wietrzyk be lauded for her grit and perseverance in the face of bodily distress? Or should she be castigated — in this event, competitors share equipment and so Wietrzyk may have created unsanitary conditions for the athletes who came behind her?

The difference between these two collections of images, Sydney Sweeney’s and Joanna Wietrzyk’s, could not have been more striking.

Whichever side you came down on, one thing could be agreed upon: Joanna Wietrzyk was not engaged in an exercise of titillation or vanity. Defecating on yourself in public is not something that can be done in a sultry manner.

The difference between these two collections of images, Sweeney’s and Wietrzyk’s, could not have been more striking. Here was Sweeney, gazing open-mouthed at the camera, prettily and painstakingly arranged in a way that just barely avoided an X rating. And here was Wietrzyk — whose images did, indeed, trigger the need for blurring or pixelation in several publications that ran them — who was not arranged at all. Whose stunningly sculpted body pushed forward despite the physical horror it was undergoing.

When we look at Sweeney, we think about how we feel. When we look at Wietrzyk, we think about how she must feel.

ESPN magazine used to annually publish a “Body Issue,” in which both male and female athletes pose naked (these might have been the photographs Sweeney was referencing in her response post). The Body Issue photographs were also carefully edited, and shot with artful lighting. In many photographs, athletes of both genders are holding the equipment of their sports in a way to deliberately cover their genitalia.

But it’s apparent to the viewer that the point of these photographs is to reveal the astounding musculature and physical prowess of athletes in motion. You might notice the way skier Jessie Diggins’s abdomen contracted during a jump; you might notice the rippling back and glutes of CrossFit’s Katrin Davidsdottir as she completed an overhead press.

The focus was on what bodies could do, and not on enticing readers with the way those bodies looked while doing it. You might also notice, for example, the pudge in the tummy of a star softball player — matter-of-fact and far less interesting than her home run record. You might wonder what it would feel like to be that excellent at a sport.

The problem with Sydney Sweeney’s ad, if you indeed think there is a problem, is not that she’s posed naked. Sydney Sweeney is always naked. It’s the one thing that I can now tell you. That woman is going to be naked and getting her bag for as long as gravity complies, and who can blame her?

Rather, if you found yourself bothered by Sweeney’s ad, I am guessing that what bothered you was the implication of what the ad expected the viewer to do.

Which was not to think about sports. And not to think about women in sports. And not to think about betting on women in sports. Sweeney is not portraying athletic excellence, after all. She is not making an ad about “just sports” any more than a naked woman rolling around on a tarp covered in marinara is making a cooking show.

Rather, the ad expected the viewer to think about women in underwear. And it used, as its backdrop, the historically fraught topic of women in sports, a field in which women are so desperate to be treated seriously that they will finish competitions with feces dripping down their legs.

“Just sex.” That’s the slogan. Fixed it.

Edgar Barrera leads the pack for Latin Grammy nominations with 10 nods

BY ANDREA FLORES

The Latin Recording Academy has unveiled the nominees for its 27th Latin Grammy Awards. The ceremony will air live Nov. 12 on Univision from the MGM Grand Garden Arena in Las Vegas.

Edgar Barrera leads the count with a total of 10 nominations, followed by Ca7riel & Paco Amoroso, Jorge Drexler, Karol G and Rosalía, who each received seven nods.

Trailing behind them are indie folk artists Silvana Estrada and Mon Laferte, who each received six nominations.

All nominations are for recordings released between June 1, 2025, to May 31, 2026.

Hit songwriter Barrera — who now holds the record for the most Latin Grammy nominations, reaching 84 this year — could make history once more if he wins in any category.

The Texas-born composer — who has collaborated with the likes of Bad Bunny, Karol G, Shakira and Maluma, along with anglophone divas like Ariana Grande and Madonna — is currently tied with Calle 13's Resi-ney's Jigsaw Productions a letter threatening to file a defamation suit, according to the Hollywood Reporter. The claims center on a text exchange between Musk and Ashley St. Clair, a former girlfriend with whom he has a child, which is presented in the film.

Musk's former romantic partners are among the people interviewed in film

'MUSK' FROM B1

In the exchange, Musk tells St. Clair he's feeling more optimistic about the 2024 election, in which he supported President Donald Trump, because "tomorrow we unleash the anomaly in the matrix." He adds, "I have over 10 thousand lasers in space right now."

I caught "Musk" at a 9 a.m. press and market screening at the Toronto International Film Festival on Sunday. There's a tremendous amount to parse, but here are a few immediate takeaways.

Yes, it's long. It earns the run time.

Sunday's screening began at 9 a.m. and let out at 1 p.m. If I hadn't looked at a clock, I might have guessed about two hours had passed.

Gibney's film moves fluidly, though. It helps that it's deeply comprehensive, beginning with Musk co-founding Zip2 in 1995 and running through the Defense Department's embrace of Grok earlier this summer.

The movie doesn't hit the audience with any atom bombs of new information. Instead, it weaves all the random strings of Musk's empire and life with which you likely have a vague familiarity — Tesla, SpaceX, his extreme pronatalism, his shifting politics, Grok, Twitter, DOGE, Starlink — into a stark character study of a man who may have once been a true believer in futurism and helping humanity.

But who, as presented by the documentary, has become a power-hungry megalomaniacal con man with a god complex.

A CG-generated Musk and a video game motif

The movie begins with Musk discussing simulation theory, the idea that we're all actually living in a computer simulation. To explain why he believes this could be true, he points to the rapid advancement of video games from Pong to hyperrealistic, dynamic massively multiplayer online role-playing games (MMORPGs) that thousands of people around the globe play simultaneously. If we can make that leap in 50 years, he reasons, how could we not have already reached a point of creating a true simulation of life?

When the documentary was first announced, before Gibney approached Musk for an interview, the tech titan tweeted, "Gibney is a douche." You can safely assume he does not participate in the film.

As a work-around, Gibney turned to Musk's interest in the simulation theory, generating an uncanny, eerie, animated digital avatar of Musk. The team used AI to sync the avatar's lips with actual statements Musk has made.

Gibney takes things further, using a video game motif throughout the movie (a nod to Musk's adoration of gaming). When Musk is making massive cuts throughout the federal government as the head of DOGE, for example, the movie turns into a first-person shooter video game in which Musk yields an animated chainsaw.

Musk's private (oh, so private) life

The most emotionally fraught aspects of the film come during interviews with Musk's former romantic partners.

His first wife, Justine Musk, with whom he had six children, said she learned the term "gaslighting" through their relationship.

Their first child, Nevada, died of sudden infant death syndrome 10 weeks after birth. In November 2022, Musk tweeted, "My first-born child died in my arms. I felt his last heartbeat."

But Justine says that she, in fact, was holding Nevada.

In a shaky voice, Justine says it wasn't uncommon for Musk to bend reality and present it as truth, to criticize her, to try to control her. While dancing on their wedding night, Musk told her, "I am the alpha in this relationship."

Elon Musk's first wife, Justine, says it wasn't uncommon for Musk to bend reality and present it as truth, to criticize her, to try to control her. While dancing on their wedding night, Musk told her, "I am the alpha in this relationship."

"He would invent the arena of the conversation and knock you out of it," she says, adding that their marriage was "war, peace, war, peace."

"I am your wife, not your employee," she recalls telling him again and again. Then, she recalls his response: "If you were my employee, I would fire you."

According to St. Clair, the former MAGA influencer with whom Musk has a child, Musk tries desperately to keep his private life private. Musk offered her $15 million and $100,000 a month for 21 years to sign a nondisclosure agreement requiring her not to share the paternity of her son Romulus with anyone except Romulus himself.

Musk first approached her via Twitter, which she says is not unusual for him. She says she's since heard from many other young women whom Musk approached on Twitter with the offer to donate his sperm to them in his ardent pronatalist attempt to populate the world with his offspring.

"It's like a Gatling gun of sperm in his DMs," she says.

The musician Grimes, with whom he shares three children, also briefly appears in the documentary, which details that while they were having their second child together, Musk secretly had twins with colleague Shivon Zilis via in vitro fertilization.

Grimes and Musk later had a custody battle over their three children, whom Grimes claimed he took from her.

One of Musk's goals, the documentary posits, is to have as many children as possible. He texted St. Clair he wants to create "a legion of children before the civil war."

In a voice-over, Gibney says there are 14 known children of dente for the title of most-awarded individual in Latin Grammy history.

Ca7riel & Paco Amoroso took home five Latin Grammy awards last year, which tied them for the most wins that night alongside Bad Bunny — who received no nominations this year.

Now, the kooky Argentine pair are nominated in multiple top categories, following the release of their experimental 2026 LP "Free Spirits" — which features collaborations with British musicians Sting and Fred Again, as well as Anderson.Paak and Jack Black. The duo is competing for album of the year, as well as record of the year for the song "Ha Ha."

Karol G is also contending for top prizes, including album of the year for "Tropicoqueta," her 2025 survey of Latin American pop. (She previously won the honors back in 2023 for her heartbreak album, "Mañana Será Bonito.") Her tender pop duet with Marco Antonio Solís, "Coleccionando Heridas," is also nominated for record of the year and song of the year.

Spanish singer Rosalía is up for record of the year, song of the year and pop song for the song "La Perla" — which features the música mexicana sibling trio Yahrítza y Su Esencia. The band resurfaced from the shadows following a public fallout with Mexican media regarding their American-leaning tastes in cuisine; their 2026 album, "Metamorfosis," is also nominated for contemporary Mexican music album this year.

There are several notable first-time nominees. This includes Xavi, whose album "Dosis" is up for contemporary Mexican music album, as well as his viral TikTok song "No Capea," which he recorded with Grupo Frontera, in the regional song category. Working-class hero Macario Martínez is also in the running for the new artist award.

Colombian artist Ryan Castro is also nominated for the first time alongside Afrobeat singer Kapo and producer Gangsta for their song "La Villa" in the urban performance category. Castro is also nominated for urban music album for his joint LP "Omerta" alongside J Balvin.

His shift to the right

Throughout the movie, we watch as Musk reverses previously held positions when it can benefit him, such as his flip from stark AI skeptic who believes it will exterminate humanity (if it doesn't keep us around as pets) to one of the loudest pro-AI voices out there who has integrated his chatbot Grok into the U.S. military.

For most of his time on the public stage, Musk was nonpolitical. In one clip, he says he's socially liberal and economically in the center. Then came the pandemic.

"Covid is when some switch got flipped in his brain," says neuroscientist and podcaster Sam Harris, who was close with Musk until they fell out after Musk began tweeting that "the coronavirus panic is dumb."

Musk became one of the loudest critics of shutdowns, reopening a Tesla factory in Alameda County despite its restrictions. Roughly 450 cases of covid-19 were subsequently reported.

Meanwhile, the government opened several investigations into Musk and his companies. The documentary argues this was the real reason behind his embrace of Trump: to shut those down.

"If Kamala Harris wins, his goose is cooked," Swisher says. "His only choice was helping Trump and Trump would leave him alone."

Or, as Tucker Carlson told him before the election: "If he loses, man, you're f---ed, dude."

"If he loses, I'm f---ed," Musk responds.

This is so much more

There barely scrapes the surface of "Musk," a triumphant work of documentary that seeks to answer a question St. Clair poses: "What is Elon actually building? What are his goals?"

There's Twitter/X. There's SpaceX. There's DOGE. There's destruction of the United States Agency for International Development and the global fallout. There's lawsuits claiming Grok is used to create child porn. There's Starlink. There's the way it's all interconnected.

Gibney doesn't end with a conclusion, instead allowing the audience to decide for themselves what to make of this almost mythical figure.

For her part, though, St. Clair has decided:

"Elon is a nuke."

COOPER NEILL/FOR THE WASHINGTON POST

Red Raider crusader

Texas Tech’s billionaire booster and Trump ally Campbell is blowing up college football

BY TIMOTHY BELLA

FORT WORTH — A Miller Lite and a jockstrap were all Cody Campbell needed to prove he was the better man.

It was a Friday night in late May, and Campbell, one of the richest oilmen in Texas and the largest booster for Texas Tech University, was at home in Fort Worth when he saw an X post from rival fan calling Campbell a “billionaire loser [act-ing] tough on the internet.”

He wouldn’t let it go. He couldn’t let it go.

“I was just picturing this guy behind a keyboard,” Campbell recalls, guffawing. “He doesn’t want any part of me.”

It all started when The University of Texas’s coach suggested his backups could whoop the starters at Tech. Campbell, a former Tech lineman and the chairman of the school’s Board of Regents, had then offered to buy out Texas’s first two games of the season to set up a battle between the two schools.

Some fans gushed, loving how Campbell had turned Tech from plucky underdogs to confident contenders. Others complained he was again trying to use his oil fortune to get what he wanted.

Then came the dare.

“I officially challenge you to an Oklahoma Drill. Name the time and place,” @LTHDiesel wrote, referring to the infamous tackling drill.

“My back yard,” Campbell responded “Tonight. Better tape your ankles.”

The Texas fan urged him to bring a mouthpiece, so Campbell wouldn’t spit up teeth after the drill.

“All I need is a Miller Lite and a jock strap,” Campbell wrote. “Bring it!!”

The showdown never happened, but T-shirts were made, and the public exchange between billionaire and troll also shed light on who Campbell is at this moment: Brash. Pugnacious. A Texas character for the social media age. A chronically online kingmaker in the worlds of oil, politics and, increasingly, college sports.

“I do think at some point you have to get out there and take people on, and not be afraid to get in a Twitter fight every now and then,” he says months later at the office for Double Eagle Energy Holdings, the Fort Worth-based oil and gas company he co-founded. “I’m just fine with that.”

At a time when college sports are unrecognizable, billionaires are calling the plays. And no one is rewriting the playbook more than Campbell, 44, one of the most influential megadonors and most prominent disrupters in the industry.

For starters, he’s fundraised and personally dumped hundreds of millions of dollars into Texas Tech, whose athletes last year earned roughly $55 million in name, image and likeness (NIL) deals negotiated by the Matador Club collective, which he co-founded with John Sellers, a fellow alum and co-founder of Double Eagle. The result: the football program’s first top-10 finish, a conference championship and an appearance in the College Football Playoff.

Now, after leveraging his political connections in Washington, including his relationship with President Donald Trump,

Defeat clinches seventh straight sub-.500 season

BY JAKE KAUDERER

Wednesday’s game was an opportunity for the Washington Nationals to secure the most victories in a season since their World Series-winning 2019 campaign.

Instead, they set a dispiriting mark.

Washington fell to the visiting Philadelphia Phillies, 3-0, for its 82nd loss and solidifying a seventh straight season below .500. The Nationals had delayed the feat with a four-game winning streak before Wednesday, but they failed for the third time in 2026 to earn their first five-game streak.

“Physically, it’s a long season, so bodies might be running down a little bit,” outfielder James Wood said.

The loss dropped Washington (71-82) to 27-39 since the start of July — a stark downturn after it went 44-43 over the season’s first four months. It was eliminated from postseason contention Sunday.

Ace Zack Wheeler stifled the Nationals, surrendering just four hits across seven scoreless innings for the Phillies (84-68). The 36-year-old earned his 15th career win over Washington — his most against any team.

Outfielder Daylen Lile, who hit the game-winning three-run home run Tuesday, got two hits against Wheeler. But he never reached scoring position. And Washington floundered against Philadelphia’s bullpen, failing to muster a hit over the final two innings.

“We know that our chances are going to be probably minimal against a guy like Zack Wheeler, we got to take advantage,” Manager Blake Butera said. “We just didn’t get that hit.”

The Nationals’ pitching largely kept a dynamic Phillies offense in check.

The success came despite Washington matching a club record with 13 walks issued. Five of the six Nationals pitchers allowed at least one walk, including five by reliever Luis Peralas.

“If I throw a ball, it kind of gets into my head that, ‘Ah, that shouldn’t be a strike,’” Peralas said through an interpreter. “It’s more on the mental side.”

natural for Week 1 to fuel some overreactions.

What happened last season was the latest example of why that might not be wise.

The Seattle Seahawks won the title against the New England Patriots in February in the only Super Bowl matchup ever played between two teams that started the season with a loss. Seattle lost to division rival San Francisco but got revenge in a blowout win in the playoffs. The Patriots shockingly lost at home to the Las Vegas Raiders, who won just two more games the entire season and wound up with the No. 1 overall draft pick.

That should be good news for the Los Angeles Rams, who came into the season as heavy Super Bowl favorites only to lose their opener, 27-7, to the 49ers in Australia last week in their lowest-scoring game with MVP Matthew Stafford at quarterback.

In all, five teams made the playoffs last season after losing in Week 1, with Chicago, Houston and Carolina joining Seattle and New England in the postseason. Nearly half of last year’s Week 1 winners — seven of 16 — missed the playoffs, with Arizona, Cincinnati and Washington all winning six games or fewer for the entire season.

Since the playoffs expanded to seven teams per conference in 2020, an average of 4.3 teams per season have lost in Week 1 but made the playoffs; 6.2 teams per season have won in Week 1 and missed the postseason.

But the Rams won’t be satisfied with just a playoff bid. After adding Myles Garrett and Trent McDuffie to a team that fell just short last season, they entered this one with plus-500 odds to win it all.

Just 12 of the 60 Super Bowl champions lost their season opener but the Seahawks were the third to do it in the past six seasons, joining Tampa Bay in 2020 and Kansas City in 2023.

But doing it after such a

Daniels needs to get up to speed against Dallas

Commanders QB has to improve decision-making Sunday vs. Cowboys

BY TASHAN REED

The start of the season was always going to be challenging for the Washington Commanders.

The schedule makers didn’t do them any favors with a three-game slate featuring road contests against divisional rivals — the Philadelphia Eagles and Dallas Cowboys — before a visit from the Super Bowl champion Seattle Seahawks. It increased the likelihood of Washington falling into an early hole that would make a return to the playoffs that much more difficult.

The Commanders almost stole a close game against the Eagles on Sunday but came up short in a 24-22 loss. If they can’t bounce back against the Cowboys (0-1), Washington will have a lot of making up to do in the NFC East. Here are five key factors for the Commanders on Sunday:

Daniels has to find a rhythm

Throughout the first three quarters against the Eagles, quarterback Jayden Daniels was out of rhythm. He lacked the decisiveness he displayed throughout training camp. Philadelphia’s strong pass coverage played a factor, but he was often sluggish in getting through his progressions and held on to the ball too long.

On average, Daniels took 3.41 seconds to release the ball, according to Next Gen Stats, which was the slowest mark in the NFL during Week 1. The pass catchers need to do a better job of separating — they were 19th in average yards of separation, according to NGS — but he also needs to speed up his decision-making.

That was Daniels’s first game in nine months, so it’s understandable that he needed time to work himself into a groove. Plus, it was his first time operating offensive coordinator David Blough’s system in a regular season game. But Daniels said

HOCKEY Capitals sign Sourdif to eight-year extension

Hours after signing 21-year-old winger Ryan Leonard to an eight-year, $84 million extension, the Washington Capitals locked in forward Justin Sourdif with an eight-year extension worth $50.8 million, for an annual cap hit of $6.35 million. Sourdif will be 25 when it goes into effect.

The moves beat the midnight deadline before the NHL's new collective bargaining agreement went into effect. The new CBA limits contracts to a maximum of seven years for a player re-signing with his own team — and a maximum of six years in free agency.

“Justin is a good young forward who has continued to develop steadily throughout his career,” Capitals General Manager Chris Patrick said. “He is versatile and demonstrated his ability to play an important forward role for our team whenever the opportunity arose last season. ... We believe he has a bright future ahead of him and are confident that he will continue to make valuable contributions to our organization in the coming years.”

Ottawa signed Drake Batherson for eight years and $86 million, which is the most lucrative contract in Senators history. The previous record was Tim Stützle's eight-year, $66.8 million extension from September 2022.

Beginning Wednesday, no contract can have more than 60 percent paid in signing bonuses. New Jersey and defending champion Carolina each got a deal done just in time.

The Hurricanes signed captain and Conn Smythe Trophy winner as playoff MVP Jordan Staal to a one-year extension, while the Devils extended recently acquired forward Luke Evangelista for five years and $36.25 million. Staal's contract is worth $900,000 in salary, with a $4 million signing bonus and up to $5.1 million in additional performance incentives. ...

The Winnipeg Jets suspended goaltender Connor Hellebuyck for failing to report to training camp.

The team said General Manager Kevin Cheveldayoff would address the media Thursday morning. It did not specify the length of the suspension for the U.S. Olympic star.

Hellebuyck, a three-time Vezina Trophy winner and 2025 Hart Trophy winner as NHL MVP, publicly requested a trade Aug. 27.

In a statement posted on X by his agent, Ray Petkau, Hellebuyck said he had privately requested a trade “several months ago” and that he gave the organization time to address it “quietly and respectfully.” ...

Drew Doughty was named captain of the Los Angeles Kings, inheriting the leadership position left vacant by Anze Kopitar's retirement.

Doughty is the 15th captain in team history. He served as an alternate captain since 2016-17, when Kopitar replaced Dustin Brown as captain. ...

The Devils hired Jessica Campbell as manager of hockey development and Bryan McCabe as VP of prospect personnel and assistant general manager of the American Hockey League's Utica Comets.

Campbell joins the Devils after spending the previous two seasons as an assistant coach with the Seattle Kraken. Campbell was the first woman to serve as an on-bench full-time assistant coach in the NHL. ...

Enforcer Ryan Reaves said he is retiring from hockey at age 39 after playing more than a decade and a half in the NHL, leaving just three players left who do not wear a visor. ...

Dylan Larkin will not skate with the Detroit Red Wings when training camp starts on Thursday due to an upper-body injury, according to interim general manager Shawn Horcoff, who said Larkin was hurt earlier this week during off-ice training.

Larkin's future with the franchise is in limbo because he asked to be traded during the offseason.

LSU's Umanmielen sued by former school

BY BRETT MARTEL

LSU sack leader Princewill Umanmielen was served legal papers related to a July lawsuit filed by the University of Mississippi which alleges that the former Rebels edge rusher owes Ole Miss $550,000 because of his decision to transfer to the rival Tigers.

Records filed in Lafayette County Civil Court in Mississippi indicate that papers were served on Tuesday, just five days before No. 7 LSU was slated to visit No. 8 Mississippi in a game immersed in hype stemming from coach Lane Kiffin's decision to leave Mississippi in favor of LSU last Nov. 30.

A person familiar with the situation said Umanmielen was served outside LSU's football operations complex. The person spoke to the Associated Press on the condition of anonymity because university officials have not commented publicly on the lawsuit between Mississippi and two former players who are now at LSU, and who allegedly failed to compensate Mississippi for their departure as required by revenue-sharing agreements they signed in early January.

The other is offensive lineman Devin Harper, who allegedly owes Mississippi $400,000.

While legal issues between Mississippi and Umanmielen have gone unre-

Tigers' sack leader served $550K lawsuit by Mississippi over decision to transfer solved for months now, the timing of papers being served, first reported by ESPN, will only further pump up the intrigue surrounding Saturday night's game in Oxford, Mississippi.

It will mark the first time Kiffin has returned to Oxford since being showered with insults by angry Rebels fans as he arrived at a small airport to catch a private plane to Baton Rouge.

Kiffin persuaded four players and a host of assistant coaches and other staff to follow him to LSU, including linebacker TJ Dottery and Winston Watkins Jr., Dottery is LSU's leading tackler through two games and Watkins Jr. leads LSU in yards receiving so far this season.

College athletes have been able to transfer far more freely in recent years without having to sit out a year, as was once required by the NCAA. There have been scattered disputes between players and their former schools over compensation agreements. Earlier this year, Washington quarterback Demond Williams Jr. said he would return to the Huskies after his school was reportedly prepared to pursue legal options to enforce his lucrative name, image and likeness contract.

Mississippi has said revenue-sharing agreements signed by both players included a provision requiring them to compensate the university with a predetermined amount if they departed before fulfilling their commitment.

“The University of Mississippi has a responsibility to enforce its contractual terms, and this position is consistent with the actions of other institutions in the current landscape of college athletics,” the Mississippi statement said. “The university attempted to amicably resolve this matter prior to filing.”

Kiffin left Mississippi following its regular season finale against Mississippi State in late November. Kiffin initially asked to continue coaching the Rebels in the College Football Playoff after he'd accepted the position at LSU, but Mississippi declined and appointed then-defensive coordinator Pete Golding as Kiffin's replacement. Golding coached Mississippi to the national semifinals.

Umanmielen had nine sacks and 13 tackles for loss as a junior last season for the Rebels. Harper was a freshman reserve in 2025, appearing in six games.

Terps' Washington keeps his cool with the Hokies on tap

BY EDWARD LEE

Malik Washington refused to take the victory lap.

After an uneven showing in Maryland's season-opening 62-0 pasting of Hampton on Sept. 5, the sophomore quarterback reminded fans and opponents of what he is capable of by passing for 347 yards and two touchdowns in Saturday's 38-14 victory over host Connecticut at Rentschler Field in East Hartford.

That performance was a triumphant rebuttal after critics questioned whether Washington had regressed from a freshman campaign highlighted by an NCAA Football Bowl Subdivision-leading 2,963 passing yards among all freshman. But if the Glen Burnie native and Archbishop Spalding High graduate was feeling emboldened to take a bow, he adroitly kept those emotions to himself while speaking to the media at SECU Stadium.

"I don't really pay attention to it," he said of doubts after finishing 19-for-31 passing for 186 yards and one touchdown against the Pirates. "It's more about me and how I feel about myself from the first game. Just judging myself and then going into the next game, continuing that, just grading myself on how I play. Not so much about what other people say."

Unlike that showing against Hampton, Washington looked more comfortable against the Huskies in his second start under offensive coordinator Clint Trickett. His yardage was the second-most in Maryland history, his 82.9 completion percentage (34 for 41) ranked fourth and his run of 18 consecutive completions during one stretch bridging the third and fourth quarters set a school record.

That outing, however, did not impress at least one member of Maryland's next opponent. Virginia Tech senior cornerback Jaquez White told the media on Monday that he spotted some limitations in Washington's game.

"He has a decent arm," White said. "I don't really think he's that accurate, but he's pretty good. He's not a runner. He's looking to throw the ball pretty much every time."

When asked about White's assessment, Washington flashed a small smile before showing off diplomacy that's wise beyond his years. "Just ready to play football," he said. "That's all I've got."

Senior inside linebacker Daniel Wingate said Washington's teammates heard White's comments.

"But we don't pay attention to it," said Wingate, a Laurel resident and Pallotti High graduate. "That's outside noise that we don't really care for. We're focused about what we're doing and what we have to do within our program. It's just a nameless, faceless opponent at the end of the day."

Washington looked composed and accurate in and out of the pocket against Connecticut. Late in the second quarter, he displayed his athleticism by ranging to his left before jumping and launching the ball to redshirt senior tight end Preston Howard standing open in the middle of the field.

Coach Michael Locksley noted that unlike the season opener against Hampton, Washington connected on his first throw and found a rhythm early against the Huskies. Locksley said the biggest difference he saw in Washington was his mindset.

"I had a conversation with him about [Hall of Fame NBA coach] Phil Jackson taking over with [Chicago Bulls star] Michael Jordan and then also doing the same thing with [Los Angeles Lakers star] Kobe [Bryant], and that triangle offense was about flow and everybody kind of being involved and touching the ball to where you don't feel like you have to do everything, and I think he got into a flow," he said. "For me, I always talk about the diversity of how we spread the ball around as a weapon for us, and he did a tremendous job with the flow of our offensive system — whether it was the tempo, getting the players involved, making the right decisions, and not forcing things. But I also thought that he didn't come into the game feeling as though, 'I have to play above my head.' I just think he let the game flow."

Saturday's game pits a pair of 2-0 teams, but the Hokies figure to present a different challenge from Hampton and Connecticut. Virginia Tech leads the country in sacks with 12, including seven in Saturday's 44-21 romp over Old Dominion, and ranks third in fewest first downs surrendered with just 17.

For his part, Washington

Virginia Tech at Maryland
Saturday, 7:30 p.m., FS1

vowed to make adjustments without worrying about what the Hokies intend to do

"Every week, you kind of talk about nameless faces and opponents," he said. "So it's not about who you're playing or what they're doing, [but] you and yourself and your scheme and your execution, the ways that help you win the game. It's not so much about what the other team is doing."

Note: Redshirt sophomore running back DeJuan Williams's availability is uncertain after he sat out the game at Connecticut. He was pulled in the second quarter of the opener against Hampton and later described "a clicking" in his knee. A team spokesman opened Locksley's news conference by saying there would be no injury updates.

Campbell — Texas Tech's billionaire Trump ally — is rewriting sport's playbook

FOOTBALL FROM B7

Campbell is also a key player in the effort to push Congress to reshape college sports. As a catalyst of the Protect College Sports Act, the bipartisan bill co-sponsored by Sens. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and Maria Cantwell (D-Washington), Campbell is pushing for federal legislation that would create a national framework for name, image and likeness money and revenue sharing; provide additional financial safety to preserve women's and Olympic sports; and offer a potential path for the Power 4 conferences to pool their TV rights, in hope of landing additional billions of dollars annually. The bill is expected to be brought to a vote in the Senate this month.

"His secret sauce is that he's a bulldog. Cody doesn't do anything halfway," says Cruz, adding that the goal is for Trump to sign the bill into law on ESPN's "College GameDay" this season. "He's devoted more hours to saving college sports, more money to it and more energy to it than frankly anyone else in the country."

It's all come at a price. The messy legal fallout from a gambling scandal involving the program's prized transfer quarterback briefly upended college football — and made Campbell and No. 13 Texas Tech into the sport's newest villain. Many of the same people who were once intrigued by Campbell bargaining onto the national stage are now offended by the billionaire whom they believe bought his way into influence.

"Cody Campbell went from a speck on a dusty road in West Texas to being everywhere that anyone turned to in college football," says Paul Finebaum, the college football commentator for ESPN and SEC Network. "He has forced people to pay attention to a place that no one really cared about."

And raised tense questions in the process, including whether it is possible for a billionaire to be part of college sports' problem and part of the cure.

Campbell isn't totally sure where it's all going. The one thing he knows is he's not the bad guy here.

"We've just done everything the right way, and we've just done it better," he says of the new heights at Tech, "and if you want to be mad about that, let's just be honest with each other."

IT'S LATE SUMMER, Texas's sweat-slicked two-a-days season, and Campbell, 6-foot-4 with his salt-and-pepper goatee, is in between meetings at the Double Eagle office to talk about his side hustles in Lubbock, Texas, and Washington. He's quieter in person than he is online, speaking so softly that, in contrast to his light-beer-and-athletic-supporter crack, it's almost disarming.

Campbell came by his twin obsessions, sports and moneymaking, honestly. His grandmother bought him his first shares of a sports trading-card company in grade school, he says, and showed him how to track the stock market.

He played at Tech for quirky coaching legend Mike Leach, who kept a stool at a Key West bar, was famously obsessed with pirates and masterminded the pass-happy Air Raid offense that revolutionized college football. When his name comes up, Campbell points to the picture above his desk. In it, Campbell is helping carry Leach, who recruited him as part of the coach's first class at Tech, off the field after upsetting Aaron Rodgers and No. 4 Cal in the 2004 Holiday Bowl.

"His dogged obsession with execution has certainly stuck with me," Campbell says of his old coach, who died in 2022.

He played briefly in the NFL before turning to energy speculation with Sellers, his Double Eagle co-CEO. They were the lowest form of oil guys when they started in 2008, surviving lease to lease until they found their niche: buying up small leases across the Permian Basin and building contiguous blocks of leases they could sell together. To date, he has helped bill and sell $15 billion in businesses, most of it related to oil, and become one of the Texas oil patch's most prolific dealmakers.

"We nearly killed ourselves doing it," Campbell says.

Campbell is as open and consistent for his love for scarlet-and-black football as he is for ruby-red politics, and he will be the first to say he has not been shy about sharing his opinions. On X, he has ripped Biden-era energy policies, reposted tweets questioning the legitimacy of climate change and posted photos of him golfing with Trump. He has given more than $3 million in federal contributions to Republican candidates and campaign committees since 2011, according to Federal Election Commission records.

But Tech football was his true love, and it wrecked him to watch the program slip into irrelevance after Leach was fired, in 2009, over allegations that he mistreated a player with a concussion. In 2021, when the football program was spiraling under then-coach Matt Wells, Campbell, who had been appointed to the Board of Regents by Texas Gov. Greg Abbott (R) that year, railed against the coach on RedRaiderSports.com. Later, he reportedly told the coach during a contentious midweek visit how he didn't like the direction of the program. Wells was fired not long after. (Wells did not respond to a message seeking comment.)

That a booster had influence was hardly novel. Before NIL turned college football on its head, it was an open secret for decades how football and men's basketball boosters would pay star players under the table to maintain the facade of "amateurism."

But when California's Fair Pay to Play Act in 2019 allowed student-athletes to profit from NIL rights, and the Supreme Court unanimously ruled against NCAA limits on education-related benefits in 2021, the floodgates were open for billionaires familiar (Nike co-founder Phil Knight at Oregon) and fresh (Oracle co-founder Larry Ellison at Michigan) to storm the field.

Few stormed harder than Campbell and his donor group, who invested hundreds of millions to upgrade the facilities, awakening the sleeping giant that is the deep-pocketed oilman class of the Permian Basin. Campbell and Sellers methodically managed the Matador Club not unlike how they managed Double Eagle's multimillion-dollar builds, landing high-end talent in the transfer portal with front-loaded NIL deals. The players were enamored.

"When you see him walk in the room, he has the presence of an alpha male," says center Sheridan Wilson, a co-captain. "When he's got something to say, it's usually going to be something really good, so we all shut up and listen."

Texas Tech Coach Joey McGuire listened, too.

"When Cody Campbell says something, then he's going to follow through with it," McGuire says from his office at Galaxy Stadium, where the field is named after Campbell. "So, you better follow through and better be ready to go."

BY THE 2025 SEASON, the Red Raiders thought they were ready. Then, Oregon, fueled by Nike's Knight, dominated them, 23-0, in the quarterfinals of the College Football Playoff at the Orange Bowl. Campbell, who heard and read the gloating from critics about how he wasted all that money just to get shut out, vowed to "double down."

Which meant he needed a quarterback.

Luring an elite one to Lubbock wouldn't be easy. Top-end signal callers are at the center of the NIL bonanza, getting paid anywhere between $2 million to $6 million annually. But Campbell found his in Brendan Sorsby, the Cincinnati quarterback and ESPN's top-rated player in the transfer portal. It cost around $4 million for the 2026 season, Campbell says, one of the highest annual salaries in college football.

But everything turned sideways in May, when Sorsby was ruled ineligible after admitting he'd placed more than $90,000 in bets, including 40 wagers on his own team at Indiana, where he'd played before Cincinnati. Campbell, the guy who peers say is typically the most prepared in any room he's in, was on his back foot.

"He needed help. It was that bad," Campbell recalls of when he met with Sorsby after he exited rehab. "Everyone has told us there's no way to have..."

He cuts himself off, still seemingly baffled.

"We've questioned ourselves extensively: 'How could we not know about this?' Because the problem was so big."

The next move seemed obvious to many: Find a new quarterback. But Tech, with Campbell's blessing, appealed to the NCAA for Sorsby to be reinstated. The NCAA denied the appeal, but Campbell kept at it, repeating in interview after interview that Tech did nothing wrong, defending Sorsby and denouncing the NCAA. When a Lubbock County judge granted the quarterback an injunction, making him eligible again, the summer of Sorsby was in full swing, with disgusted coaches and athletics directors vowing to boycott.

The NCAA appealed the judge's decision in early June. Texas Attorney General Ken Paxton, the Republican nominee for the Senate, warned the Big 12 that sanctioning Tech for playing Sorsby was "unlawful" and could result in $200 million in damages. His letter came one day after Campbell had donated more than $274,000 to a fundraising committee supporting Paxton's Senate bid, campaign finance records show.

Paxton's office did not respond to requests for comment. Campbell denies that he had paid Paxton to intervene. "If I wanted to make a nefarious deal," he told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram at the time, "there are plenty of places and ways to do so."

Sorsby, who declined to be interviewed, ultimately gave up his eligibility and is planning to enter the 2027 NFL Draft. The remainder of his contract was voided, Campbell says.

The saga perfectly captured the chaos of college sports at a time when betting is banned but advertisements for sportsbooks fill college stadiums and the airwaves for ESPN and Fox, the sport's two biggest TV partners. College players are getting paid like NFL players, and NFL players want to come back to play in college. Players are suing conferences, and conferences are suing their own members. While Athletic Director Kirby Hocutt maintains that Tech "did the best that we could in standing behind a young man who had made some mistakes," the damage had already been done to Campbell and the Red Raiders, the new villains with long memories.

"We've moved past it, but we're not going to forget," Campbell promises, suggesting that pettiness is on the menu. "There may be some coaches that are upset with us when we're up by 50 and still throwing the ball in the fourth quarter."

Amid this chaos, Campbell has mostly thrived. In Lubbock one afternoon, as Lil Durk's "Should've Ducked" blares across the practice fields, the student managers set up the snow-cone pushcart in the 95-degree weather. The players retrieve their red and blue treats before walking through a facility that has gone through $242 million worth of upgrades, creating the largest continuous football facility in the country. Meanwhile, a Paramount+ crew wraps up filming for the four-episode docuseries about the offseason.

In other words, it's a regular Thursday in the Cody Campbell era of Texas Tech football.

"He's gonna change the game for everybody," linebacker Ben Roberts says after practice. "It's super cool that you have a guy in your corner who has those connections."

Especially when those connections include the president.

AS LEE GREENWOOD'S "God Bless the USA" faded out at Double Eagle's site in Midland, Texas, in July 2020, a grinning Trump thanked Campbell for lauding him as an invaluable ally of the oil-and-gas industry. Before rolling into his stump speech, Trump acknowledged Campbell's financial influence — and his resilience.

"He was wealthier four months ago, but he'll be up there very soon," Trump said of Campbell, referring to the economic toll of the pandemic. "He's doing good."

Six years ago, as Texas and Oklahoma were about to bolt the Big 12 Conference for the SEC, the latest seismic shift in college football, Tech's Board of Regents tasked Campbell with figuring out what was going on with college sports. Campbell has been adamant that he and lawmakers believe they don't think it's the government's job to fix college sports. But in his deep dive on all things NCAA, he says, he also concluded that the governing body would never make the changes needed to sustain college athletics. Government intervention, he believes, is the only option.

"There was no real way to fix the problem outside of legislation, and I started thinking about what needed to be done there," Campbell remembers. "And then, President Trump got elected."

Trump soon named Campbell to the President's Council on Sports, Fitness, and Nutrition. Then, Campbell says, he made the case to administration officials that college sports reform offered a rare and buzzworthy bipartisan initiative that Trump could actually push through Congress. White House officials now consider Campbell one of the three most important players on college sports reform, alongside Nick Saban, the legendary former Alabama coach, and Randy Levine, the president of the New York Yankees.

Campbell recognizes he is trying to fix a spending problem he has helped exacerbate, but he finds comfort in what Levine told him about why the megadonor should have a say: "If you want to stop bank robbers, you call the guy who's been robbing the bank."

"[Campbell] could go another path and be focused on the school he cares for the most, but that's not what he's doing," says Sen. Eric Schmitt (R-Missouri), a vocal supporter of the bill. "He's interested in a good outcome. That gives him credibility."

Cruz and Cantwell introduced the bill in May. Campbell, who admits the bill isn't perfect, is especially enthusiastic about one provision: reforming the Sports Broadcasting Act of 1961, allowing power conferences to gain an anti-trust exemption to pool their media rights together and sell them like the NFL and other professional leagues do. If this were to happen, Campbell estimates that there could be an additional $7 billion in annual revenue available to be distributed across the 130-plus schools in the Football Bowl Subdivision, which he says would go a long way to sustaining women's and Olympic sports.

While the bill is expected to be brought to the Senate floor this month, critics are skeptical how realistic it is for the SEC and Big Ten, the two most powerful conferences in college sports, to voluntarily give up their multibillion-dollar TV deals for a chance to make more with the Big 12 and ACC. Some have also wondered whether Campbell's push for government reform is disguised to benefit his alma mater.

SEC Commissioner Greg Sankey said that the landman has "a fundamental misunderstanding of the realities of college athletics." Sankey, Big Ten Commissioner Tony Petitti and ACC Commissioner Jim Phillips declined interview requests. Big 12 Commissioner Brett Yormark is supportive of Campbell's efforts with the bill, even if the two found themselves in a public spat over scheduling a Tech home game on a Friday night in a state where high school football is sacred.

"We're not always going to agree," Yormark says, stressing the mutual respect between them. "We're very similar from the standpoint that we have great conviction in what we believe in, and we both want to win. But there are going to be moments where we agree to disagree. That's life."

He adds, "Cody Campbell has a seat at the table."

INSIDE A DOUBLE EAGLE OFFICE largely covered in Texas Tech-related mementos, Campbell is eager to get to work. He has tweeted less than usual lately, other than asking Sen. Chris Murphy (D-Connecticut), an opponent of the bill, on X, if he's "ever even worn a jock strap."

But he still reads whatever unflattering things are said about him and his intentions for Tech and college sports.

"Coach Leach used to say mean things to me, and I learned to just kind of move on," he says. "I think that people should not try to assume I am one thing or another unless they've actually had a chance to talk to me about what my motivations are."

He makes his case again: "I have nothing but good intentions here."

The next morning, after his private plane touches down in Lubbock, about 75 people await on Campbell to begin the Board of Regents meeting. It is another world he oversees — a more mundane existence with less tweets and sound bites and more charts and financial statements. But Campbell loves it. He strikes his gavel twice.

"It's a great day to be a Red Raider," he says, and all the eyes in the room are fixed squarely on him.

McLaurin, O-line need to step up for Washington

COMMANDERS FROM B7

Wednesday that it was “no excuse” for playing poorly. He looked far more settled in during the fourth quarter, and the Commanders are hopeful that carries over against a Cowboys defense that struggled mightily in a Week 1 loss to the New York Giants.

McLaurin must get involved

Wide receiver Terry McLaurin was limited to two catches for 14 yards last week and was targeted just four times. While it’s true that the Eagles sent extra attention toward McLaurin, that’s simply too low of a target share for a player of his caliber.

“You try to predict what you could see,” Daniels said Wednesday when asked how to keep McLaurin involved. “I’m not going to force-feed Terry the ball. I’ll still go through my reads. But when those opportunities present themselves for Terry to make plays, I know he’ll make ‘em.”

The responsibility ultimately falls on Blough to scheme McLaurin open. Perhaps shorter, quick-hitting passing concepts to get him going early in the game would make a difference.

Dallas’s secondary was already questionable, and now it will be without starting free safety Malik Hooker, who suffered a broken forearm against the Giants. So it should be easier for the Commanders to unlock the passing game this week.

Onus on the secondary

Although the Commanders held Eagles quarterback Jalen Hurts to a pedestrian stat line Sunday, he was able to hurt them on explosive plays as they allowed four completions of 17-plus yards. Given that the Cowboys’ CeeDee Lamb and George Pickens are two of the most explosive wide receivers in the NFL, Washington can’t allow that trend to continue.

Cornerback Mike Sainristil received a lot of flak for his struggles in coverage, but safeties Nick Cross and Jeremy Reaves also had costly miscues that contributed to the chunk plays. The breakdowns were a result of both communication issues and poor technique.

“I’ve got a lot of confidence in Mike. I really do,” Commanders Coach Dan Quinn said Wednesday. “I love him. I’m certain that he’ll be one leveling up on plays that he knows can be controlled.”

Defensive coordinator Daronte Jones calls an aggressive defense. Against the Eagles, he dialed up blitzes on a third of their snaps (the ninth-highest rate in the NFL), which helped Washington pressure Philadelphia on 36.4 percent of its dropbacks (11th). It also reduced the margin for error for the defensive backs, since they didn’t have as many players in coverage.

Even an effective pass rush can’t completely make up for poor play on the back end. Facing a dynamic duo in Lamb and Pickens, with a quarterback capable of making every throw in Dak Prescott, the secondary must be much sharper.

Terry McLaurin was targeted just four times Sunday against the Eagles, a number the Commanders need to drastically augment in Week 2.

More action for Williams?

Rookie wide receiver Antonio Williams was excellent in the fourth quarter last week. He only had one catch for 16 yards through the first three quarters, but he came alive with three catches for 48 yards in the final period. His last was a one-yard touchdown catch that gave Washington a chance to tie the game.

Williams played just 26 snaps, which was the second fewest among the Commanders’ active wide receivers. It feels safe to say he has earned a larger role in the offense.

O-line needs to step up

The offensive line stood out as a concern during camp because of many of the issues that showed up against the Eagles. For starters, the Commanders couldn’t get the run game going, averaging 4.1 yards per carry. Quinn said he thought they “left some meat on the bone” in the run game, and noted that made it easier for Philadelphia to sit back in two-high safety coverages.

Although Daniels’s tendency to hold on to the ball didn’t make life easier in pass protection, the offensive line also just got beat on multiple occasions. Philadelphia pressured Daniels on 50 percent of his dropbacks. That’s obviously not good enough.

Center Nick Allegretti had a challenging afternoon. His biggest miscue was a whiffed block that doomed the Commanders’ two-point conversion attempt that could have tied the game late. His snaps were fine, but his blocking wasn’t up to par.

Left tackle Brandon Coleman also had a long day. He allowed a team-high nine pressures and surrendered a sack, according to NGS. There will inevitably be a drop-off from the injured Laremy Tunsil to Coleman, but the Commanders expect more.

The Cowboys’ defensive front played poorly last week, but it’s a talented group. Quinnen Williams, Kenny Clark and Rashan Gary are high-impact players who will test Washington’s offensive line.

News and notes

Linebacker Jordan Magee was placed on injured reserve Wednesday because of the hamstring injury he suffered against the Eagles. He’ll have to miss four games before he’s eligible to return. Ale Kaho, who is on the practice squad, stands out as a sensible option to call up to the active roster.

Tight end Chig Okonkwo (hamstring) and linebacker Frankie Luvu (groin) didn’t practice Wednesday. Their status for Sunday is questionable.

Defensive end Dorance Armstrong practiced for the first time this season after serving a one-game suspension, though he was limited Wednesday with a knee injury. It will be interesting to see whether he or outside linebacker K’Lavon Chaisson gets the starting nod against the Cowboys. (Chaisson was also limited Wednesday with a knee issue.)

“He’s got really good rush skills,” Quinn said of Armstrong. “He’s very complementary in that he can work outside, inside. . . . To see his speed back and his explosion back, that’s a big deal.” ...

Safety Tyler Owens (ankle) practiced Wednesday. He’s trending toward playing Sunday.

Defensive tackle Daron Payne, defensive end Charles Omenihu, linebacker Odafé Oweh and wide receiver Jaylin Lane joined Armstrong and Chaisson as limited participants. ...

The Commanders signed offensive lineman Lucas Patrick, who has logged starts at center and guard throughout his career.

He appeared in six games for the Cincinnati Bengals last season. ...

Cowboys linebacker DeMarvion Overshown (hamstring) didn’t practice Wednesday.

An opening defeat is no longer a harbinger of anxiety for 0-1 teams lopsided Week 1 loss would be unusual. Only one eventual champion, New England, lost the opener by at least 20 points. The Patriots lost, 31-0, in Week 1 to Buffalo in 2003 before winning 34 of 37 games the rest of 2003 and ‘04 to win back-to-back Super Bowls.

Auspicious start in Big Apple

The New York City area has been at the bottom of the NFL over the past decade, with the New York Jets having the league’s worst record since 2016 and the Giants ranking second-worst.

That’s what made the start of this season so surprising. The Jets beat the Tennessee Titans, 23-10, on Sunday afternoon and the Giants upset the Dallas Cowboys, 28-20, on Sunday night. That marked the first time both teams won in Week 1 since 2009. Each lost the opener in five of the past seven years.

With both teams taking a 1-0 record into Week 2, this is just the second season since the start of 2016 that both the Jets and Giants had winning records at the same time. It also happened for a 10-week stretch in 2022, ending after the Jets lost in Week 15 to fall to 7-7 on the way to a 7-10 finish.

There have only been five times that both teams made the playoffs in the same season. It happened in 2006, 2002, 1986, 1985 and 1981.

New coaches off and running

head matchups, with Mike McCarthy’s Pittsburgh Steelers beating Kevin Stefanski’s Atlanta Falcons, and Clint Kubiak’s Raiders beating Jeff Hafley’s Miami Dolphins.

The other winners were Arizona’s Mike LaFleur against the Los Angeles Chargers, Baltimore’s Jesse Minter against Indianapolis, and Buffalo’s Joe Brady beating Houston.

The other two losing coaches were Tennessee’s Robert Saleh against the Jets and Cleveland’s Todd Monken against Jacksonville.

NFC South’s rough start

One season after the Carolina Panthers won the division and became the fifth team to make the playoffs with a losing record in a nonstrike season, the NFC South got off to a rough start in 2026.

The Panthers lost, 59-37, to Chicago and their three division rivals also lost. Tampa Bay fell, 33-27, to Cincinnati, New Orleans lost, 31-

30, to Detroit in overtime and Atlanta fell, 20-13, to Pittsburgh.

This marked just the eighth time since the merger that every team in one division lost in Week 1. That last happened with the NFC North in 2021.

The offenses weren’t the issue. Three of the teams topped 30 points and had 107 combined points, the most in any week for a division without a single win, topping the 100 for the NFC North teams in Week 2 of the 2023 season.

Odds and ends

Here are a few other statistical standouts from Week 1:

The Philadelphia Eagles won their sixth straight opener as Nick Sirianni became the only coach in NFL history to appear in at least six openers and win them all. That’s the longest active winning streak in Week 1. The last team to have a longer streak was Kansas City with eight straight from 2015-22. ...

Carson Wentz replaced an injured Kyler Murray to throw three touchdown passes and no interceptions in Minnesota’s 39-22 win over Green Bay. The only other quarterback to come off the bench in an opener and throw at least three touchdowns and no interceptions since starts were first tracked in 1950 was Hall of Famer Fran Tarkenton, who did it in the first game in Vikings history in 1961 against Chicago. ...

Pittsburgh’s T.J. Watt had two sacks and a pick-six in a win over Atlanta. Watt now has 117 sacks and 10 interceptions in his career, joining Hall of Famer Julius Peppers as the only players with at least 100 sacks and 10 interceptions. ...

Bijan Robinson was nearly the entire offense for the Falcons with 83 yards rushing, 90 yards receiving and the team’s only touchdown in the loss to the Steelers. Robinson produced 65.8 percent of the offense for the Falcons and 10 of the team’s 19 targets in the passing game. The previous running back who had at least half of his team’s targets was LaDainian Tomlinson with 15 of 28 for the Chargers in Week 17 of the 2003 season against the Raiders.

NFL NOTES

QB Murray takes field following concussion

FROM NEWS SERVICES

Kyler Murray was well enough to join the Minnesota Vikings for practice on a limited basis on Wednesday, leaving open the possibility he could progress through concussion protocol to play Sunday.

Whether Murray is able to start at Chicago or Carson Wentz continues running the offense, the quarterback will be without his leading rusher: Jordan Mason was placed on injured reserve with a designation to return because of a broken thumb.

Mason is expected to be back on the active roster after the minimum four weeks, Coach Kevin O’Connell said, after X-rays revealed a small fracture that required a minor procedure.

• FALCONS: As Atlanta Coach Kevin Stefanski said Monday he’s not ready to announce a starting quarterback for Sunday’s home opener against the Carolina Panthers, Cooper Rush’s one-week hold on the job is in jeopardy.

Michael Penix Jr. may be close to reclaiming his role as the starter, especially since Tua Tagovailoa was held out Wednesday after leaving practice last Thursday with an oblique injury.

Rush started in the Falcons’ 20-13 season-opening loss at Pittsburgh this past Sunday as Penix and Tagovailoa were inactive.

Rush’s performance in the loss was shaky. He threw two interceptions, including T.J. Watt’s pick-six in the fourth quarter.

• 49ERS: San Francisco rookie wide receiver De’Zhaun Stribling is expected to miss at least two months after undergoing surgery on his injured left ankle.

Stribling got hurt in the season opener last week against the Los Angeles Rams and Coach Kyle Shanahan said that he opted for surgery. Shanahan said Stribling would go on injured reserve later this week and was expected to miss about 10 weeks.

The 49ers also placed backup tight end Jake Tonges on injured reserve with a season-ending knee injury that required surgery on a torn MCL.

• CHIEFS: Kansas City expects to have cornerback Mansoor Delane on the field when it plays the Indianapolis Colts on Sunday night, less than a week after the sixth overall pick in the draft hurt his shoulder on the opening series of his NFL debut against the Denver Broncos.

• JETS: New York safety Minkah Fitzpatrick and rookie wide receiver Omar Cooper Jr. did not practice because of injuries and Coach Aaron Glenn said they are “week to week.”

Fitzpatrick injured his groin early in the Jets’ season-opening 23-10 win at Tennessee on Sunday. Cooper, a first-round draft pick, also left with an ankle injury after his 30-yard catch-and-run on New York’s opening touchdown drive.

• COLTS: Indianapolis wide receiver Keenan Allen will face two misdemeanor charges in an alleged drunken driving incident, according to court records.

The six-time Pro Bowler was formally charged with operating a vehicle with alcohol concentration equivalent to 0.15 or more and operating a vehicle while intoxicated. He posted $500 cash bond, and his attorneys waived an initial hearing that had been scheduled for Wednesday.

• RAVENS: Baltimore placed rookie wide receiver Ja’Kobi Lane on injured reserve after he had wrist surgery.

Star wide receiver Zay Flowers missed practice because of a hamstring injury suffered in the Ravens’ 41-23 win over the host Colts on Sunday. Coach Jesse Minter said Flowers’s status is day-to-day.

• LIONS: Detroit will be without two starting offensive linemen against the Buffalo Bills on Thursday night.

The Lions ruled out rookie offensive tackle Blake Miller (knee) and guard Christian Mahogany (hip) with injuries. Cornerback D.J. Reed (foot) was questionable on the injury report Wednesday.

• MISC.: ESPN’s Joe Buck agreed to a six-year, $108 million extension that will keep the play-by-play announcer in the “Monday Night Football” booth into the next decade, The Athletic reported.

“I prayed that he was with a family that needed him more than me,” Kyla Primas said after her dog, Kash, disappeared.

When Kyla Primas brought home her puppy in 2024, he would run around her yard in New Jersey or relax with her as she worked from home.

“He would follow me everywhere I went,” Primas said of her Bernedoodle named Kash.

In fall 2025, Primas moved to Baltimore to be with her partner, and got a job as a third-grade teacher. The couple moved in together near Johns Hopkins Hospital, and Kash became more skittish.

“He heard nothing but sirens and people yelling and trucks going by. He was not used to that at all,” Primas said. “That made him really nervous.”

One day in January, Primas went out to pick up dinner. While she was gone, her partner, Morgan Hall, took out the trash, and Kash dashed out the door.

Primas and Hall spent most of the night looking for Kash. The next day Hall called out from work to make posters and keep looking.

Then that weekend a major snowstorm hit.

“I spent all day crying,” Primas said.

She didn’t know how Kash would survive on his own. She kept looking, but also started hoping that someone had taken him in so he would be safe and warm.

Comey caught in crosshairs once again

DOJ REVIVES ACTIONS AFTER DISMISSALS

Federal appellate panel expresses skepticism

BY JEREMY ROEBUCK

A federal appellate panel expressed skepticism Tuesday about the Justice Department’s bid to revive prosecutions in Virginia of former FBI director James B. Comey and New York Attorney General Letitia James, following a court ruling last year that the prosecutor overseeing them had been illegally appointed.

The three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit appeared poised to uphold that earlier decision, which dismissed both cases after concluding Trump loyalist Lindsey Halligan had been unlawfully serving as interim U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia when she secured indictments against the prominent Trump critics.

The panel’s ruling — expected in the coming months — could carry significant implications for the Trump administration’s broader fight over the president’s authority to handpick prosecutors overseeing the Justice Department’s most consequential cases.

For months, administration officials have been locked in a battle with courts across the country over the president’s power to install allies in key prosecutorial posts while bypassing the Senate confirmation process — a dispute probably bound for the Supreme Court.

On Tuesday, two of the 4th Circuit panel members — Judges Albert Diaz and Henry F. Floyd, both appointees of President Barack Obama — questioned the government’s assertions that presidents could appoint an unending series of temporary U.S. attorneys without ever having to seek Senate approval.

“Under your reading of the statute, a nefarious, ne’er-do-well executive could do exactly

Spanberger is bullish about Virginia House races

Map isn’t favorable, but governor has eyes on the midterm elections

BY GREGORY S. SCHNEIDER

When Virginia’s state Supreme Court in April struck down a voter-approved redistricting referendum that would have helped Democrats pick up four seats in the House, Gov. Abigail Spanberger (D) feared the state would become an afterthought in this year’s midterm elections.

“There was a tense period of time where it was within the realm of reasonable worry that people might not engage as aggressively” with the campaigns, Spanberger said in an interview this week. “Will people pay attention? And even, to some degree, will people here in Virginia be deflated?”

Spanberger said the court’s action has energized the Democratic base. “We’ve really had tremendous engagement,” she said.

As the national political environment grows more favorable to Democrats, Virginia has emerged as home to some of the most competitive House districts — even without a new map Democrats hoped would assure victories. Spanberger argued all along that they could still win seats under the current map, especially in the two red districts she carried in her election last year.

Those are the 1st Congressional District, where Henrico County prosecutor Shannon Taylor is challenging incumbent Rep. Rob Wittman (R), and the 2nd District, where ex-congresswoman Elaine Luria is trying to get the seat back from Rep. Jen Kiggans (R).

Taylor and Luria have created a joint fundraising alliance with former congressman Tom Perriello, who is mounting a long-shot challenge to Rep. John McGuire (R) in

Spanberger said people shouldn’t count out Democrat Beth Macy pulling off an upset win in the rural 6th District, even though elections analysts see Rep. Ben Cline (R) heavily favored in the deeply red district he won by 28 percentage points in 2024.

So far, Luria, Macy and Perriello have outraised their opponents, according to the nonpartisan campaign finance site Virginia Public Access Project. Wittman, with nearly two decades in office, has far more cash than Taylor, but their fundraising pace is similar.

Welcome news: Chesapeake Bay’s underwater grasses expanded by nearly 13 percent in 2025

BY KARL HILLE
Baltimore Sun

Underwater grasses in the Chesapeake Bay and its tidal tributaries increased 13 percent in 2025, covering almost 5,000 more acres in Maryland’s portion of the Bay, the Maryland Department of the Environment reported.

“More underwater grass means more habitat for blue crabs and fish, cleaner water, and a more resilient Chesapeake Bay,” Maryland Department of Natural Resources Secretary Joshua Kurtzsaid in a statement. “This year’s increase is welcome progress, but it also reinforces the work ahead. We need to keep reducing pollution, protecting existing underwater grass beds, and restoring the shallow-water habitats that allow these plants and the Bay life that depends on them to thrive.”

The 2025 coverage, totaling 36,799 acres in the Maryland portion of the Bay, represents 36 percent of Maryland’s goal to restore 114,000 acres of vegetation.

Across the whole bay, grasses increased 7 percent, populating 6,000 more acres to cover almost 90,000 acres. The Virginia Institute of Marine Sciences published its annual survey of submerged aquatic vegetation, mapping the entire bay and tidal tributaries. The coverage was the sixth highest recorded since aerial measurements began in 1984.

The grasses are a key indicator of Bay health because they require clear water to get the sunlight they need to thrive. Maryland’s pollution control programs are aimed at reducing the murky water created by erosion and algae blooms. They further improve water quality by absorbing nutrients, trapping suspended silt, adding oxygen to the water and helping reduce shoreline erosion, state officials said.

Bay grasses also store carbon and reduce acidification, which in turn benefits crab and oyster fisheries.

“What is especially encouraging about 2025 is that the gains were not confined to one place,” Brooke Landry, Submerged Aquatic Vegetation program chief for Maryland DNR and chair of the Chesapeake Bay Program’s SAV Workgroup, said in a statement. “We saw expansion in both freshwater and moderately salty parts of Maryland’s Bay waters.”

Longtime firefighter, and a former deputy chief in Annapolis, is appointed the state’s fire marshal

BY TODD KARPOVICH
Baltimore Sun

Caroll H. Spriggs II, a longtime firefighter and former deputy fire chief in Prince George’s County and Annapolis, has been appointed Maryland’s state fire marshal, becoming the first African American to hold the position in the agency’s 132-year history.

Spriggs, 53, was appointed Wednesday to a six-year term by Maryland State Police Superintendent Michael A. Jackson. Spriggs will lead the Office of the State Fire Marshal, which oversees fire and arson investigations, explosives investigations, fire-code enforcement and fire-prevention efforts across Maryland.

He most recently served as a deputy fire chief with the Prince George’s County Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department. He previously was a deputy fire chief for the city of Annapolis and a task force officer with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

He also spent 38 years with the Huntingtown Volunteer Fire Department in Calvert County. In 2019, he was elected to the National Bomb Squad Commanders Advisory Board and was named its secretary in 2020.

“With a career rooted in service and extensive experience in fire investigation and explosives, Spriggs brings a wealth of knowledge and a commitment to the Maryland State Fire Marshal’s Office,” Jackson said in a statement.

The selection process began in May, when the position was advertised. The State Fire Prevention Commission reviewed candidates’ résumés and forwarded its top candidates to Jackson, who made the final selection.

“I would like to thank Colonel Jackson for this tremendous opportunity,” Spriggs said. “I look forward to working with all of the partners of the MDSP to continue making Maryland safe.”

Spriggs succeeds Chief Deputy Jason Mowbray, who has served as acting state fire marshal since December 2023. Mowbray will move to the Maryland State Police senior management team after helping with the transition, the department said.

The Office of the State Fire Marshal has 85 employees, including more than 42 deputy state fire marshals, according to the department. It also collects statewide fire incident data and coordinates fire-prevention efforts.

Despite previous court actions, former FBI director Comey could be caught in federal crosshairs again that,” said Diaz.

The third member of the panel, Trump appointee Julius N. Richardson, appeared far more receptive to the Justice Department’s view that the disqualification of Halligan was improper and should never have resulted in the cases’ dismissals.

“Two grand juries in this case found probable cause that these defendants committed federal crimes,” department lawyer Henry C. Whitaker said of Comey and James. “I would respectfully submit ... that the grand juries’ decisions in these cases should be respected.”

Comey and James, both of whom have denied any wrongdoing, were among the earliest targets of President Donald Trump’s push to deploy the Justice Department as a tool of retribution in his second term.

Comey has since been charged in a separate indictment with threatening Trump by posting to social media a photo of seashells spelling out “86 47” — a purported reference to Trump, the 47th president. Prosecutors say “86” is mob slang for “kill.” The former FBI director has denied those allegations and vowed to fight them at trial.

But the cases before the 4th Circuit on Tuesday involved indictments Halligan obtained last year against Comey, for allegedly lying to Congress about whether he had ever authorized leaks to the media, and James, for a supposed mortgage fraud scheme involving alleged misrepresentations of her use of a Virginia home.

The charges against both came over objections from career prosecutors — including Erik S. Siebert, the former Trump-appointed U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia — over the strength of the evidence in the cases.

When Siebert declined to move forward last fall, Trump forced him out of his job and installed Halligan, a former White House aide and one of the president’s former personal lawyers, in his place.

Within weeks, Halligan, who had no previous prosecutorial experience, secured the indictments, appearing alone before the grand juries that returned them.

“U.S. attorneys wield tremendous power over individuals’ life and liberty,” Ephraim McDowell, an attorney representing Comey, said Tuesday. “That’s why, since the founding of our nation, U.S. attorneys have been confirmed by the Senate. ... Those protections help ensure that the president cannot simply install his political allies as the chief prosecutors throughout the nation.”

Last fall, U.S. District Judge Cameron McGowan Currie dismissed both cases after hearing similar arguments, ruling that Halligan’s appointment had violated federal law.

Typically, the Senate must confirm a president’s U.S. attorney picks. But the law empowers the attorney general to temporarily fill vacancies by making an interim appointment for a period of 120 days.

Because Siebert, before his ouster, had already served a full four-month stint as the temporary U.S. attorney, the administration could not legally place Halligan in the role for another interim term, Currie ruled.

And because Halligan was not lawfully serving in her position at the time she single-handedly appeared before the grand juries that indicted Comey and James, both indictments carried no legal weight, the judge ruled.

At the time, Currie’s ruling was the highest-profile decision on an issue that has bedeviled the Trump administration in courts across the country.

Judges have similarly disqualified those leading U.S. attorney’s offices in New Jersey, Nevada, Los Angeles, New Mexico, and Albany, New York, on similar grounds. Three of those rulings have been upheld by federal appellate courts.

In each instance, the Justice Department had adopted an expansive view of its authority to temporarily fill U.S. attorney vacancies with the president’s candidate of choice, despite efforts by Congress to limit the circumstances under which appointees can fill those roles without first receiving Senate approval.

Last week, the Justice Department urged the Supreme Court to weigh in on the matter, appealing a decision on the disqualification of Sigal Chattah, who had been leading the U.S. attorney’s office in Nevada.

Department lawyers said that if those rulings against the administration’s view are allowed to stand, the leadership of 14 of the country’s 93 U.S. attorney’s offices — currently led by temporary picks who have served beyond the 120-day deadline — could suddenly be thrown into doubt.

Whitaker, on Tuesday, called the Justice Department’s authority to make such appointments “unambiguous.”

Should the 4th Circuit side with him, it is still unlikely that Halligan would return to her old job. She resigned earlier this year under pressure from the judges of the Eastern District of Virginia after refusing to leave office for months following Currie’s ruling disqualifying her.

The U.S. attorney’s office is now led by First Assistant U.S. Attorney Theo Stamos, a career prosecutor the Trump administration appointed in July.

It is also uncertain that a ruling in the Justice Department’s favor would mean that Comey and James would ever stand trial in Virginia.

In dismissing the Comey case last year, Currie concluded that the case against him could not be recharged because the statute of limitations had by that point expired — a point the Justice Department disputes.

Both Comey and James also had several unresolved motions seeking the dismissal of their cases on other legal grounds at the time Currie threw out their indictments.

CAHILL

EDWARD CAHILL
Edward H. Cahill (1944-2026)
Dr. Edward H. Cahill III passed away on September 11, 2026, from injuries sustained in a bicycling accident on August 30, 2026.
Dr. Edward H. Cahill “Ed” was a retired pediatrician who cared for generations of Howard County residents. He was also a husband, a father, and a grandfather.
Survivors include his wife of 59 years, Mary V. Cahill (nee Baumberger); son Edward H. Cahill IV (wife Stephanie), Columbus, Ohio; daughter Catherine M. Cahill, Boynton Beach, Florida; and granddaughters Nora, Adelaide, and Rosemarie Cahill, Columbus, Ohio.

ward H. Cahill Jr. After graduating from the University of Maryland School of Medicine in 1970, he completed his pediatric residency at the University of Maryland Hospital in 1973. He served two years as a pediatrician in the United States Air Force at Seymour Johnson Air Force Base in Goldsboro, North Carolina. He later completed a second residency at Johns Hopkins University in 1976, specializing in child psychiatry. Dr. Cahill was a founding partner of Ellicott City Pediatric Associates with his fellow physician, Ted Leffler. Prior to his retirement, Ed was recognized by his peers as the longest-serving pediatrician in Howard County. For over 55 years, Dr. Cahill took every opportunity to indulge in his life’s passion for cycling. He joined like-minded bike enthusiasts as a participant, member, and occasionally officer of the Baltimore Bicycling Club.

A memorial service will be held at 11 am EDT, Saturday, September 19, 2026, at Glen Mar United Methodist Church, 4701 New Cut Road, Ellicott City, Maryland 21043.

many communities that were important to her.

Barbara served with the United States Government in roles involving civil rights and labor management, and concluded her federal career with the Office of Child Supervision. In addition to her career, Barbara was active in Alpha Kappa Alpha Sorority, Incorporated; The Links, Incorporated; and the Northeasterners.

Barbara is survived by her husband of 59 years, Stephen H. Davis; her children, Stephanie (Oscar), Shannon, and Stephen (Abby); her grandchildren, Charles (Grace), Caroline, Stephen, and Grayson; her great-grandson, Theodore; as well as extended family and dear friends.

A private ceremony will be held under the direction of McGuire Funeral Service of Washington, DC. In lieu of flowers, the family asks that memorial contributions be made to Fisk University in honor of Barbara Bruce Davis.

Barbara will be remembered for her devotion to family, her lasting friendships, and her years of public service. She leaves behind a lifetime of love and memories that will be treasured by her family and friends for generations to come.

WILSON

EDWARD C. WILSON (Age 71)
Edward C. Wilson, “Ted” to his friends, died of complications from prostate cancer on September 3, 2026. He was just shy of his 72nd birthday.

Ted was part of a close circle of devoted friends from all walks of life. He had a great sense of high-minded fun and could stay awake for days at a time. His fiercely curious mind, expansive sense of wonder, and adventure were qualities present at an early age. This spirit continued to be present throughout his entire life.

As in high school, Ted was loved and respected by friends from college, graduate school, and his professional career. Ted was a modern Renaissance man, who had a remarkable depth of interest in, and knowledge of, history, art, and culture. His expansive love of music spanned from Corelli to the Jefferson Airplane, and his love of the graphic arts spanned Albrecht Dürer to Oskar Kokoschka, and beyond. Ted was a gifted amateur artist, beginning in childhood and carried this passion through adulthood. Anyone who was fortunate enough to receive a card, letter or note with his whimsical drawings, should consider it to be one of their most prized possessions.

In addition, Ted was an accomplished and cultivated oenophile. He immersed himself in French vintages, and was always ready to share his wide-ranging knowledge and extensive collection with friends and family. His computer passwords were usually variations on French wine-growing regions.

Ted is survived by Mary Catherine Jarboe, his wife of one month and devoted significant other of 33 years. He is also survived by three first cousins, Jeremy Graham Wilson, Anna Wharton Phillips, and Robin Chamberlin Milburn. Ted leaves many broken hearts in his wake.

A funeral mass will be held on Saturday, September 19, 2026, at Our Lady of Victory Catholic Church, 481 MacArthur Boulevard, NW, Washington, DC. 10:00am visitation followed by the 11:00am mass. Interment private.

MARYLAND DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT WATER AND SCIENCE ADMINISTRATION NOTICE OF TENTATIVE DETERMINATION

Prince Georges's County
Application for State Discharge Permit 2SDP3156, NPDES Permit
MD0067482-

NSA Goddard Space Flight Center, Code 250, Greenbelt, Maryland
20771, applied for a renewal of a permit to discharge an average of 658,293 gallons per day of noncontact cooling water, boiler blow-down, and variable volumes of stormwater (from a research) and office facility, located at 8800 Greenbelt Road, Greenbelt, Maryland 20771, to an unnamed tributary of Beaverdam Creek (Use I tributary of Anacostia River) and to Bald Hill Branch, a Tier 2 stream segment (Use I tributary of Western Branch of Patuxent River).
The permit regulates discharges from Outfalls 001 and 004. The Department proposes to issue the permit with the following limitations:
At Outfall 001—total copper (24.3 %g/l) quarterly average, 42.4 %g/l (daily maximum); at Outfall 004—total copper (36.4 %g/l) quarterly average, 58.6 %g/l (daily maximum). At Outfalls 001 and 004, total residual chlorine (0.111 mg/l) quarterly average, 0.019 mg/l (daily maximum), temperature (90°F maximum), pH (range of 6.5 to 8.5), and monitoring without limitation as proposed flow, dissolved copper, and hardness.
The permit also requires reporting facility changes that increase pollutant discharges to Tier II waters, submitting an annual nutrient assessment, and reporting nitrogen and phosphorus contributions under coverage under the Department's industrial stormwater general permit or no exposure certification, as applicable.
Per MD Environmental Article 8-1-202(a)(2), an EJ score was calculated for this facility. The EJ Score is 67.30. This score has been calculated considering the combination of the following factors: information on the Exposure Percentile, Pollution Burden Environmental Effects Percentile, and Sensitive Population Percentile. For more information on how the score was calculated, launch the MDEnviroScreen tool from this website - https://mde.maryland.gov/Environmental_Notices/Pages/EnviroScreen.aspx.
A copy of the draft permit, draft fact sheet, and permit application may be downloaded from the Department's website at https://mde.wa-terandscience.org/portal. At that website, search for permit Number 2SDP3156, click "More info," and then select the desired documents.)
If a written request is received by October 7, 2026, a public hearing on the tentative determination for this application can be scheduled.
Written comments should be sent to the Maryland Department of the Environment, Water and Science Administration, 1800 Washington Blvd., Baltimore, Maryland 21203-1708. Attn.: Jonathan Rice, Chief, Industrial and General Permits Division and must include the name, address and telephone number (home and work) of the person making the request, the name of any other party whom the person making the request may represent, and the name of the facility and permit number. Failure to request a hearing by October 7, 2026 will constitute a waiver of the right to a public hearing on the tentative determination for this permit.
Written comments concerning the tentative determination if submitted to the Department, to the attention of Jonathan Rice at the above address, on or before October 19, 2026, any hearing requested by a person who requests a hearing may request an interpreter at the hearing by October 19, 2026. The hearing will be held on October 15, 2026 at 10:00 a.m. at the address at least ten working days prior to the scheduled hearing date. All comments and requests may also be emailed to jonathan.rice@maryland.gov.
Information supporting the tentative determination, including the draft permit and fact sheet, may be reviewed by contacting Mr. Rice at the above telephone number to make an appointment or by written request to Mr. Rice at the above address. Copies of documents may be obtained at a cost of $0.36 per page.

SEPTEMBER 28, 2026 at 10:00 AM

ALL THAT FEE SIMPLE LOT OF GROUND and improvements thereon situated in PRINCE GEORGE'S COUNTY, MD and more fully described in the above-referenced Deed of Trust Tax ID# - 10-1096411.

The property will be sold in an "AS IS WHERE IS" condition without either express or implied warranty or representation, including but not limited to the description, fitness for a particular purpose or use, structural integrity, physical condition, construction, extent of construction, workmanship, materials, liability, zoning, subdivision, environmental condition, merchantability, compliance with building or housing codes or other laws, ordinances or regulations, or other similar matters, and subject to easements, agreements and restrictions of record which affect the same, if any. The property will be sold subject to all conditions, liens, restrictions and agreements of record affecting same including any condominium and of HOA assessments pursuant to Md Real Property Article 11-110.

TERMS OF SALE: A deposit of $16,000.00 payable in certified check or by a cashier's check will be required from purchaser at time of sale, balance in immediately available funds upon final ratification of sale by the Circuit Court of PRINCE GEORGE'S COUNTY, MARYLAND interest to be paid at the rate of 3.625 % on unpaid purchase money from date of sale to date of settlement. The secured party herein, if a bidder, shall not be required to post a deposit. Third party purchaser (excluding the secured party) will be required to complete full settlement of the purchase of the property within TEN (10) CALENDAR DAYS of the ratification of the sale by the Circuit Court otherwise the purchaser's deposit shall be forfeited and the property will be resold at the risk and expense, of the defaulting purchaser. The purchaser waives personal service of any papers filed in connection with its failure to settle within ten days of ratification and expressly agrees to accept service by first class mail at the address provided by the purchaser as identified on the Memorandum of Sale. The defaulted purchaser shall not be entitled to any surplus proceeds resulting from said resale even if such surplus results from improvements to the property by said defaulted purchaser.

Adjustment of all real property taxes, including agricultural taxes, if applicable, and any and all public/private charges or assessments, to the extent such amounts survive foreclosure sale, including water/sewer, ground rent, and front foot benefit charges, to be adjusted to the date of sale and thereafter assumed by purchaser. Purchaser is responsible for any recapture of homestead tax credit. All transfer taxes and recordation taxes shall be paid by purchaser. Condominium fees and/or homeowners association dues, if any, shall be assumed by the purchaser from the date of sale.

Purchaser is responsible for obtaining physical possession of the property and assumes risk of loss or damage to the property from the date of sale. If the sale is rescinded or not ratified for any reason, including post sale lender audit, or a resale is to take place for any reason, the purchaser(s) sole remedy in law or equity shall be limited to the refund of the aforementioned deposit. The Substitute Trustees will convey either marketable or insurable title. If they cannot deliver one or the other, or if the ratification of the sale is denied by the Circuit Court for any reason, the purchasers sole remedy, at law or equity, is the return of their deposit, without interest.

The purchaser waives all rights and claims against the Substitute Trustees whether known or unknown. These provisions shall survive settlement Upon refund of the deposit, this sale shall be void and of no effect, and the purchaser shall have no further claim against the Substitute Trustees. The sale is subject to post-sale review of the status of the loan and that if any agreement to cancel the sale was entered into by the lender and borrower prior to the sale then the sale is void and the purchaser's deposit shall be refunded without interest. Additional terms and conditions, if applicable, may be announced at the time and date of sale.

If this transaction is subject to the FinCEN Residential Real Estate Reporting Rule ("RRE") issued pursuant to the Bank Secrecy Act, information necessary to comply with the RRE Rule must be obtained provided to the Reporting Person, as defined in RRE Rule, prior to closing. File No. (26-14229)

The property will be sold in an "AS IS WHERE IS" condition without either express or implied warranty or representation, including but not limited to the description, fitness for a particular purpose or use, structural integrity, physical condition, construction, extent of construction, workmanship, materials, liability, zoning, subdivision, environmental condition, merchantability, compliance with building or housing codes or other laws, ordinances or regulations, or other similar matters, and subject to easements, agreements and restrictions of record which affect the same, if any. The property will be sold subject to all conditions, liens, restrictions and agreements of record affecting same including any condominium and of HOA assessments pursuant to Md Real Property Article 11-110. TERMS OF SALE: A deposit of $44,500.00 payable in certified check or by a cashier's check will be required from purchaser at time of sale, balance to be immediately available funds upon final ratification of sale by the Circuit Court of CHARLES COUNTY, MARYLAND interest to be paid at the rate of 2.99 % on unpaid purchase money from date of sale to date of settlement. The secured party herein, if a bidder, shall not be required to post a deposit. Third party purchaser (excluding the secured party) will be required to complete full settlement of the purchase of the property within TEN (10) CALENDAR DAYS of the ratification of the sale by the Circuit Court otherwise the purchaser's deposit shall be forfeited and the property will be resold at the risk and expense of the defaulting purchaser. The purchaser waives the right to extend the time for settlement, time being of the essence. The Substitute Trustee also reserves the right to reject any and all bids and to void the Property from sale in her sole discretion. In the event the Noteholder or an affiliate of the Noteholder is the successful bidder at the sale, the Noteholder or the affiliate of the Noteholder will not be required to post a deposit and will be permitted to credit bid the amount of the Noteholder's debt under the Deed of Trust to its bid.

Adjustment of all real property taxes, including agricultural taxes, if applicable, and any and all public/private charges or assessments, to the extent such amounts survive foreclosure sale, including water/sewer, ground rent, and front foot benefit charges, to be adjusted to the date of sale and thereafter assumed by purchaser. Purchaser is responsible for any recapture of homestead tax credit. All transfer taxes and recordation taxes shall be paid by purchaser. Condominium fees and/or homeowners association dues, if any, shall be assumed by the purchaser from the date of sale.

Purchaser is responsible for obtaining physical possession of the property and assumes risk of loss or damage to the property from the date of sale. If the sale is rescinded or not ratified for any reason, including post sale lender audit, or a resale is to take place for any reason, the purchaser(s) sole remedy in law or equity shall be limited to the refund of the aforementioned deposit. The Substitute Trustees will convey either marketable or insurable title. If they cannot deliver one or the other, or if the ratification of the sale is denied by the Circuit Court for any reason, the purchaser's sole remedy, at law or equity, is the return of their deposit, without interest.

The purchaser waives all rights and claims against the Substitute Trustees whether known or unknown. These provisions shall survive settlement Upon refund of the deposit, this sale shall be void and of no effect, and the purchaser shall have no further claim against the Substitute Trustees. The sale is subject to post-sale review of the status of the loan and that if any agreement to cancel the sale was entered into by the lender and borrower prior to the sale then the sale is void and the purchaser's deposit shall be refunded without interest. Additional terms and conditions, if applicable, may be announced at the time and date of sale.

If this transaction is subject to the FinCEN Residential Real Estate Reporting Rule ("RRE") issued pursuant to the Bank Secrecy Act, information necessary to comply with the RRE Rule must be obtained provided to the Reporting Person, as defined in RRE Rule, prior to closing. File No. (25-21903)

SUBJECT TO AND INCLUDING the right-of-way to said property through the "Property" as shown on the Deed recorded in Deed Book 12 at page 119, among the aforesaid Land Records.

TAX MAP ID: 27-71A

PROPERTY ADDRESS: 1509 Mountain View Road, Stafford, Virginia

being all that real property described in a Deed dated October 6, 1978, 5, 2000 from Anthony C.Y. Cheng, Yun Li Cheng and Mountain View Orchard, Inc, as grantors, to Mountain View Orchard, Inc., as grantee, recorded among the land records of Stafford County Circuit Court at LR00019502.

According to Stafford County Virginia's tax assessment records, the Property is believed to consist of approximately 215.03 +/- acres. It is believed that a portion of the Property is currently utilized as an operating Asian pear orchard. The Property is also believed to be improved by a two-story residence and storage barn. The Substitute Trustee, the Noteholder and the auctioneer calling the sale make no representations or warranties of any nature or kind regarding the Property, including, without limitation, the nature or use of the Property, or the actual acreage of the Property. Bidders at the foreclosure sale shall be solely responsible for conducting their own due diligence with respect to the Property.

TERMS OF SALE: A deposit in the amount of $100,000.00, payable by cashier's check, made payable to "Lizabeth Lee Walther", or other form acceptable to the Substitute Trustee, will be required of the successful bidder ("Purchaser") at the time and place of sale. The Purchaser shall be required to increase the amount of the deposit to ten percent (10%) of the bid amount (the "Buyer's Premium") by the time of sale. A cashier's check made payable to "Lizabeth Lee Walther" to the Substitute Trustee.

In addition to the bid amount and other costs associated with conveying the Property to the Purchaser as stated herein, the Purchaser shall be required to pay a buyer's premium in the amount of ten percent (3%) of the bid amount (the "Buyer's Premium") to the auctioneer calling the sale.

The Substitute Trustee price and the Buyer's Premium shall be due upon settlement of the foreclosure sale, which shall occur within twenty (20) days of the date of the sale, however, the Substitute Trustee reserves the right to extend the time for settlement, time being of the essence. The Substitute Trustee also reserves the right to reject any and all bids and to void the Property from sale in her sole discretion. In the event the Noteholder or an affiliate of the Noteholder is the successful bidder at the sale, the Noteholder or the affiliate of the Noteholder will not be required to post a deposit and will be permitted to credit bid the amount of the Noteholder's debt under the Deed of Trust to its bid.

All senior liens, real estate taxes, recordation taxes, assessments, water charges and municipal charges owed against the Property which are not extinguished by the date of sale shall be the responsibility of the Purchaser and shall be paid for by the Purchaser at settlement. The costs of documentary stamps, recording taxes, document preparation, transfer taxes, grantor and grantee taxes, and other charges associated with the conveyance of the Property to the Purchaser shall also be the responsibility of the Purchaser.

The Purchaser is advised and encouraged to conduct its own independent investigation and due diligence concerning the Property and all matters affecting the Property prior to bidding at the sale, including, without limitation, the title to and condition of the Property, the existence and priority of any liens or encumbrances, taxes and assessments, zoning and land use, environmental conditions, occupancy, leases and tenancies, governmental requirements, and any other matters that may affect the value, use, ownership, or possession of the Property.

The Substitute Trustee and the Noteholder disclaim all representations or warranties of any kind for the Property. The Property will be sold in an "AS-IS" condition and subject to all encumbrances, liens, reservations, covenants, conditions, restrictions, rights of way, easements, taxes, senior liens, and all other matters that are not extinguished as a matter of law by the foreclosure sale and such state of facts that an accurate survey or physical inspection of the Property might disclose. The Purchaser at the foreclosure sale shall assume the risk of loss for the Property immediately after the foreclosure sale takes place. Furthermore, it shall be the Purchaser's responsibility to obtain possession of the Property after settlement.

In the event the Purchaser fails to go to settlement as required, the aforementioned deposit shall be forfeited and the Property shall be resold at the Purchaser's risk and expense. If the Substitute Trustee is unable to convey the Property as described above, the Purchaser's sole remedy at law or in equity shall be limited to the refund of the aforementioned deposit without interest thereon. Upon refund of the deposit to the Purchaser as aforesaid, the sale shall be void and of no further force or effect, and the Purchaser shall have no further claim against the Substitute Trustee or the Noteholder. Additional terms may be announced at the time and place of sale. Written notice has been or will be provided as required by Section 55-1-321 of the 1950 Code of Virginia, as amended and the Deed of Trust.

That stylish, super-durable sofa might be toxic

BY DINA CHENEY

A couch that lasts 200 years? Sounds great in theory. But durability isn't always a positive.

According to Jonsara Ruth, co-founder and executive design director of Healthy Materials Lab at the Parsons School of Design, many long-lasting, durable items in homes — such as insulation, flooring and fabrics — contain harmful chemicals such as formaldehyde and phthalates. Over time, these compounds can permeate the air or migrate into household dust. And when those items are discarded, chemicals can end up in the groundwater — and stay there for centuries.

Materials that last the longest are often the most toxic, says Ruth, who is also the founder of the design studio Salty Labs. Take vinyl flooring products, many of which are made from polyvinyl chloride (PVC), a plastic that doesn't biodegrade. Luxury vinyl tile (LVT) can be durable and style-forward, but "it can also bring toxins into your home," Ruth says. "When it gets torn out and gets into the landfill, it will remain durable, which means it will not break down easily." (Some companies, such as Solidfloor, make PVC-free versions.)

Although durable, maintenance-free home products are appealing from a consumer perspective, Ruth says, factors such as health and environmental impacts should also be considered. And there are many hardy, non-harmful materials that have stood the test of time.

"The origins of materials that are positive, we find over and over again, are plants," Ruth says.

Wood is one exemplary material. Not only is it long-lasting, but it also can develop a pleasing patina. Between solid hardwood and engineered wood, the latter is generally more durable, says Kim Rich Meister, an assistant professor of furnishings and interiors at the University of Georgia. Engineered wood, which includes a thin layer of real wood over plywood or another composite, doesn't expand and contract as much. But it can't be refinished as many times as solid hardwood.

Cork, which comes from tree bark, is "renewable and stunning," says Lisa Sundahl Platt, a design scientist at the University of Florida and the Florida Institute for Built Environment Resilience. Whether installed as flooring or wall paneling, the material is lightweight and resistant to moisture.

The materials that last the longest in our homes often contain the most harmful chemicals.

"The origins of materials that are positive, we find over and over again, are plants."

Since ancient Egypt, linen has been produced from the fibers of the flax plant. Linen upholstery and bedding is washable, strong and generally biodegradable, Ruth says. And linoleum flooring, which is made with linseed oil, is durable, economical and sustainable, Meister says.

The hemp plant is another savvy choice. When its fibers are spun, they produce a linen-like textile used for carpeting and upholstery. The stalk's interior can also be cut and mixed with a lime-based binder to create hemp-lime insulation. This type of insulation, produced by companies including Hempitecture, can have very low amounts of embodied carbon, whereas traditional insulation includes petroleum-based foam. Chemicals in that foam have been linked to asthma and other respiratory conditions.

Like a futuristic spin on the fable "The Three Little Pigs," the company New Frameworks fabricates compressed-straw insulation panels. Similarly innovative are adhesives made from soybean meal, a replacement for the formaldehyde-based glues often used in plywood, laminated wood flooring and particleboard. The PureBond line from Columbia Forest Products includes plywood free of added formaldehyde.

Minerals are another category to mine. Copper is antimicrobial and develops a beautiful patina, says Meister, who recommends the material for sinks. Mineral pigments are another age-old material, used since prehistoric times. Mineral paints tend to be vapor-permeable, which can make them more resilient in humid environments than conventional acrylic-based paints. True mineral paints are also free of chemicals. Check the ingredient list, as some paints marketed as "mineral" contain acrylic resins or synthetic additives.

Animal-based materials provide yet more options. For centuries, milk protein (casein) has been used as a binder in paints. Milk paint, which typically includes lime and pigment, is durable and water-insoluble, with a sophisticated matte finish.

When it comes to upholstery fabrics, wool is strong, naturally flame-resistant and insulating. Leather is similarly long-lasting and doesn't absorb odors. In the 19th century, the material was often used to upholster furniture in rooms where people smoked, Meister says. And scratch marks on leather tend to read as signs of character rather than flaws. (But it must be noted that cows emit large amounts of methane and that chromium, often used in tanning, has been linked to allergic contact dermatitis.)

Some synthetic or composite materials are also worth considering. Meister praises engineered quartz, which — like granite — is stain-resistant. She also recommends porcelain, which is denser and less porous than traditional ceramic tile. Stainless steel is corrosion-resistant and an apt choice for fixtures, and a satin nickel finish is easy to maintain, she adds. For upholstery, Meister often turns to Crypton, an engineered performance upholstery fabric that resists mildew, germs and stains.

First and foremost, though, check the fine print. Bamboo is a renewable material, yet many engineered bamboo flooring products are made with synthetic adhesives that contain formaldehyde, Ruth says. Organic wall coverings might be installed with synthetic adhesives that emit high levels of volatile organic compounds (VOCs).

"It's like reading the ingredients in your food," Platt says. "Always read the ingredients in your materials."

20 easy ways to save money

BY KEVIN BRASLER

For several years, American consumers’ finances have been squeezed by surging housing costs, climbing grocery bills, and costs for insurance, utilities and child care that have increased faster than wages. Since 1976, Consumers’ Checkbook’s research has found that most families spend more than necessary, often because marketplaces are designed to make overpaying easy and comparison shopping hard. Ready to make some changes and start saving? Here are 20 ways to do it.

1 Buy less stuff.

Retailers and brands spend billions of dollars conditioning American consumers to spring for the latest, most hyped products. The dopamine hit from a new purchase is real but short-lived, and it leaves many in long-term debt. Before clicking “buy” or heading to the mall, ask yourself (or family): “Do I actually need this?” Waiting a day or two often provides clarity.

2 Shop around for the best price, and don’t get fooled by fake sales.

Over the last 50 years, our researchers have collected more than a million prices from every sort of home service and retailer. We nearly always find enormous differences for the exact same work or product. And don’t let a “sale” price short-circuit your comparison shopping. Last year, Checkbook’s researchers spent six months tracking prices at 25 major retailers and found that 21 advertised “sale” prices more than half the time — meaning the “discount” is usually just the regular price.

3 Buy used or get it free.

For furniture, kids’ gear, tools, bikes, sports equipment, books and clothing, used is usually good enough and often costs far less. Try Facebook Marketplace, Craigslist, eBay and thrift stores, but don’t overlook gifting networks like the Buy Nothing Project and Freecycle.org.

4 Avoid purchases that sound sensible but aren’t.

That includes extended warranties for appliances and electronics, air-duct cleaning, home warranties, credit-monitoring services and vehicle-service contracts. Checkbook’s research has identified dozens of products, services and add-ons widely marketed as smart buys that are almost always bad deals.

5 Don’t upgrade your phone until you must.

Skipping even one upgrade cycle saves you hundreds and lets you avoid trading in a perfectly good device at a fraction of its value.

6 Keep your car longer.

The average new car now sells for more than $50,000. More than 1 in 5 new car loans in recent years have been for 84 months or longer. A longer loan means paying far more interest and staying underwater — owing more than the car is worth — for years. Every year you drive a paid-off car is thousands of dollars saved on payments, depreciation and insurance.

7 Try to pay bills on time, stay out of high-interest debt and seek help if you need it.

A growing number of Americans are finding it difficult to pay their bills. Nearly half of all credit-card holders carry balances from month to month, with many paying more than 25 percent interest.

“Debt is no longer a background concern, but a daily struggle for many families,” said Bruce McClary, a vice president at the nonprofit National Foundation for Credit Counseling. “People are having to make some really tough decisions: Should they buy certain types of groceries or get their medication? Should they pay one bill on time and let another one slide?”

Digging out from credit card debt might seem impossible. But with hard work, discipline and guidance from a certified credit counselor, it can be done. To find a counselor, visit NFCC.org or call 800-388-2227.

Avoid for-profit “debt relief” and “debt settlement” companies, which often leave clients’ finances worse off.

8 If you carry credit card balances, the card you use matters a lot.

Airline-miles cards, hotel cards and other rewards cards typically carry interest rates of 25 to 30 percent. If you’re not paying your balance in full every month, the interest charges will be far more expensive than the value of any points you earn.

If you have high-interest credit card debt, a personal loan from a bank or credit union may be a better deal. Consolidating a $10,000 credit card balance into a personal loan at 10 percent interest will save you hundreds of dollars each year and give you a reasonable payoff date.

9 Shop around every year or two for car and home insurance.

Our research shows that most policyholders can save more than $500 a year by switching to a lower-priced auto and/or home insurance company; some save $1,500 or more.

10 Choose your health insurance plan carefully each year.

Most people stick with the same plan year after year. That can be costly. During your next open-enrollment period, do an audit of your needs and choices. The goal is to match what you’re paying for with what you use. The savings can be significant.

11 Maximize your employer benefits.

FSAs, HSAs, 401(k) matching, free counseling through EAPs, tuition reimbursement, legal plans ... most employees leave lots of money on the table every year by not paying close attention during open enrollment. A 401(k) match alone, if you’re not capturing it fully, is leaving money behind.

12 Shop around for prescription drugs.

Drug prices vary wildly among pharmacies, sometimes by a factor of 10 or more for the same medication. Paying out of pocket with a discount service like GoodRx or Cost Plus Drugs can be significantly cheaper than your insurance co-pay. Also, always ask your doctor whether a generic is available and suitable for you.

13 Take care of your health.

The best way to reduce health care costs? Take preventive measures: Annual physicals, well-woman visits, mammograms, flu shots, colonoscopies. Most health insurance plans minimize out-of-pocket costs for these types of services. To save even more, select in-network providers and double-check your medical bills for errors.

14 Switch to a lower-cost grocery store.

Food prices continue to soar, but our evaluations of grocery store prices find that most shoppers can save by taking advantage of low-cost supermarket options. Compared to most conventional chains, Aldi, Lidl, Walmart and Wegmans offer big savings: For a family that spends $300 per week at the supermarket, a 15 percent price difference totals savings of $2,340 per year.

15 Cook more, and break up with delivery services.

Cooking simple meals at home a few more times a week can save a typical household $150 to $200 a month compared with restaurant meal costs. When you get takeout, pick up your own food; delivery apps are brutally expensive once you add fees, tips and menu markups.

16 Get multiple bids on home repairs and improvements.

Checkbook’s research shows the price you pay has almost nothing to do with the quality of work. For any significant job, get at least three to five fixed-price bids, and be especially wary of companies that pressure you to sign the same day.

17 Audit your subscriptions.

The average American now spends more than $1,000 a year on subscriptions. Most households pay for several things they’ve forgotten about. Set aside 30 minutes, go through your credit card and bank statements, and ax anything you haven’t actively used in the past month.

18 Use your library.

Most people pay for services they can get free with their library card: Books and audiobooks through the Libby app, streaming movies through Kanopy, logins for paywalled websites and discounts on museum passes. Before paying for a streaming service, an audiobook subscription or a digital magazine, check what your library offers.

19 Take advantage of free government and nonprofit resources.

Many local governments offer programs residents don’t know about: Recreation centers, youth sports leagues and, in some areas, subsidized broadband. Free tax preparation is available to many Americans through IRS Free File and VITA sites.

20 Don’t get scammed.

American consumers lose tens of billions of dollars to fraud every year. Never send money via wire transfer or gift cards in response to an urgent request, no matter how convincing the story. Never give remote access to your computer or phone. Verify any urgent financial request — even one that appears to come from a family member — by calling them back on a number you already have. Get free monitoring on your credit reports at AnnualCreditReport.com and place a free security freeze on your accounts with Equifax, Experian and TransUnion to prevent new accounts from being opened in your name.

Does your house need therapy? Let's unpack that.

These specialists can solve design problems that might be harming your well-being

BY JOLIE KERR

Different forms of therapy abound: psychotherapy, physical therapy, occupational therapy, therapy for our pets. Now add "house therapy," a multidisciplinary approach to our living spaces that combines elements of interior design, professional organizing and household management.

If you've ever walked into your house and thought, "Why doesn't this feel right?" the answer might be to seek a house therapist. "Something isn't working, but you don't necessarily know what the solution is," says Cara Woodhouse, an interior designer and co-author of "It's a Mood: Your Home. Your Vibe." Rooms that nobody uses, a chaotic entryway, closets that make getting dressed stressful, furniture that interrupts the natural flow of a room or poor lighting are problems a house therapist might help solve.

"House therapy identifies those friction points and then uses design, organization, editing, functionality and sometimes very small changes to make the home feel better," Woodhouse says. It asks us to consider the relationship between ourselves and our homes, and to make changes accordingly. "Your house should support the way you actually live, not the way you think you're supposed to live," she adds. "That's where house therapy can be incredibly valuable."

House therapy is more than decorating or organizing

Traditional interior design is externally focused on what a room should look like, says Anita Yokota, a licensed therapist, an interior designer and the author of "Home Therapy" and "Grounded Living." A house therapist dives deeper.

LESLEY UNRUH

House therapy goes well beyond decorating and taps into your psyche, says author Olga Naiman, who designed this space.

LESLEY UNRUH

A room designed by Naiman, who says clients often come to her when they are ready for a big change in health, wealth or relationships.

“I start internally,” Yokota says. “How do you want to feel here? How do you want your relationships to function here? What’s creating stress or friction? Then I use interior design, organization, psychology, neuroscience and biophilic design (an approach to interior design that uses natural elements) as tools to answer those questions.” The goal is to create a beautiful home, she adds, “but one that also reduces cognitive load, supports the nervous system, and makes everyday life and connection easier.”

House therapy goes well beyond decorating, says Olga Naiman, an interior designer and the author of “Spatial Alchemy: Design Your Home to Transform Your Life.” “A house therapist is someone who designs the home with a deep awareness of how it will shape your psyche,” she says.

A house therapist combines elements of professional organizers, who bring order and systems to the things you already own; house managers, who manage and oversee daily operations and logistics; and interior designers, who focus on the aesthetics of a home.

the dots between the problem you’re having in your life and how your home is designed,” says Naiman, who offers online sessions that start at $400 for an evaluation to identify patterns and to give clients a strategy and framework. In-person consultations are also available. Her pricing is in line with that of traditional interior design services, which typically start at $300 for a consultation and $200 to $500 an hour for hands-on work.

“A house therapist starts with the person,” Woodhouse says, by asking about sources of frustration, what you love about your home, what you might be avoiding and, most crucially, how you want to feel when you come home.

Our homes reveal much about our inner world

House therapy begins with conversations while exploring the house. “We identify where their home is reinforcing unwanted patterns and outdated identities,” Naiman says.

One of Naiman’s clients grew up in an unsafe, chaotic home because of substance abuse and “carried that pattern into her life,” she says. “I saw it every- where in her house. Every table she owned had skinny, rickety legs. Her home felt airy-fairy. Nothing in that house was rooted.” They redesigned the space with stability in mind, “and the home became the expression of a new pattern instead of a reinforcement of the old one.”

Many of Naiman’s clients seek house therapy after being in traditional therapy. “[They] are ready to align their home with the insights they’ve had there. It’s one thing to say in a therapist’s office that you’ve never felt safe in your body. It’s another to design your home to give your inner child the safety and nourishing they always yearned for and didn’t receive,” she says. “Designing your home to re-parent your inner child, to give them what they longed for and never got, is a powerful approach.”

Call in a house therapist when health, wealth and relationships are at stake

“Most of what people bring me falls into three areas — health, wealth and relationships,” Naiman says. “I believe the home holds the key to much of that. It can be beautiful and still be blocking you in the exact ways you feel stuck in your life.”

When a client mentions problems in their romantic relationships, for example, Naiman draws a connection to a bedroom that isn’t designed with intimacy in mind. “What I see most often are all-white, minimalist bedrooms that lack both sensuality and pulse, unbalanced rooms where one side has weight and the other has nothing, or art that is chaotic, aggressive, pointy or melancholic,” she says. “Can you see the symbolism?”

After working to reimagine their bedrooms, some of Naiman’s single clients have reported meeting partners, and some married couples say their relationships deepened.

House therapy, Yokota says, “helps create environments where the nervous system can feel safer, calmer and more nurtured. I want people to understand that their environment is already affecting how they think, feel, connect and function and that you can feel transformed inside and out in your own home.”

A house therapist will help you evolve

Transitions, too, are a time to consider calling upon a house therapist. House therapy can be particularly helpful during major life changes, such as moving into a new home, combining households, having children, becoming empty nesters, working from home, going through a divorce or losing a partner. Naiman, who is not a licensed therapist, calls herself an alchemist. “Alchemy is the ancient art of transformation,” she says. “The clients who come to me are the ones ready for a big transformation in their lives, often right around a threshold moment.”

Woodhouse, too, feels strongly that our homes have an enormous effect on our energy, mindset, routines and relationships. “When your surroundings work for you, there is an ease to everyday life that you can actually feel,” she says. “That’s what house therapy is really about — creating a home that takes care of you as well as you take care of it.”

Don't let your flora become a feast for fauna

BY JESSICA DAMIANO
Associated Press

There's little worse in a gardener's mind than watching their careful planning and hard work go up in a cloud of teeth, thanks to every four-legged free-loader within chewing distance.

So if you're planting bulbs this fall, selecting the right ones can help you avoid planting dinner.

Although no plant is 100 percent animal-proof, some spring-blooming bulbs have toxic or unpalatable self-defenses that deer, rabbits and rodents tend to avoid.

One word of caution, though: Pet owners and parents should think carefully before deciding to grow these within reach of children or furry family members.

Let's start with the most offensive bulbs

Crown imperials aren't referred to as "stink lilies" for nothing. One whiff of the malodorous, tufted, downward-facing, bell-shaped flowers will transport you to a skunk sanctuary — or a sweaty locker room. No self-respecting living thing would deliberately sniff, let alone eat, any part of the plant, which also contains highly toxic steroidal alkaloids.

But don't let that dissuade you from planting them. The striking plants not only keep rodents away, but they attract pollinators and are exceptionally eye-catching in the spring garden. Just don't plant them near the front walk.

Alliums are related to onions, and their bulbs' scent makes no secret of it, so they're typically left undisturbed. Their flowers have a similar, although milder, fragrance. If rabbits are particularly hungry, they might attempt a nibble, but the bitter sulfur compounds in the bulbs, leaves and stems will send them running. The plants are also toxic.

Similarly, all types of daffodils — from demure jonquils to giant trumpet types — contain bitter, toxic properties that most critters know to avoid.

These bulbs aren't as offensive, but they are off-putting

Although nicely scented to us humans, the strong, sweet perfume emanating from Dutch hyacinth flowers is off-putting to many animals, as is the fruity scent of the unrelated grape hyacinth, which deer and rabbits perceive as musky. Neither is as offensive as pungent alliums, but both hyacinths also contain toxic compounds that cause mouth irritation and stomach upset if bitten or ingested.

Spanish bluebells contain saponins, which smell and taste like soap, as well as poisonous cardiac glycosides.

Snowdrops, Siberian squill, anemone, glory of the snow, winter aconite and star of Bethlehem are smaller, so-called "minor" bulbs with flowers that bloom earlier than the larger bulbs above. But they pack a punch in deterring wildlife browsing, thanks to their unpalatable smell, bitter taste and/or toxic compounds.

Because they have strong defenses, multiply readily and are not kept under control by animals, some of these plants, particularly Siberian squill, Spanish bluebells and star of Bethlehem, can quickly become invasive, so plant with caution.

Mix the offensive bulbs with other bulbs that animals love

All of these plants have spent generations using their natural defenses to avoid being eaten, and you can take advantage of that, too.

If you'd like to plant bulbs that animals love to eat, such as tulips or crocuses, try surrounding them with unpalatable ones. As they exude odors and chemicals to protect themselves, some of those defenses will extend to their bedmates.

Jessica Damiano writes weekly gardening columns for the Associated Press. She publishes the Weekly Dirt Newsletter.

No plant is 100 percent animal-proof, but certain bulbs are more likely to repel rabbits.

The promise of an ‘allergen-free’ pet is alluring. It’s also inaccurate.

JANE SYKES

Q: My son has asthma and my doctor suggested I avoid getting a pet. Would choosing a hypoallergenic breed be a good solution for us?

A: Given that over half of households in the United States own a pet, it’s not surprising that pet allergens — such as dander, which are particles shed from an animal’s skin, and saliva — commonly trigger allergies in humans. It’s estimated that pet allergies affect 10 percent to 20 percent of people worldwide. They became even more common during the pandemic, likely due to increased pet adoption and closer contact with pets in the home. Cuddling or co-sleeping with pets is especially likely to trigger allergies.

Considering all of this, it’s not surprising that the promise of an “allergen-free” pet is alluring. While you might be able to reduce the chance you’ll react to your pet by choosing a breed that sheds less frequently and taking some other allergen-reducing measures, there’s no animal that is guaranteed to be 100 percent free of potential allergens.

What triggers pet allergies

Allergic reactions occur when your immune system overreacts to a harmless substance, known as an allergen. When this happens, your body produces excessive amounts of an antibody called IgE (Immunoglobulin E) to fight the allergen, which triggers the release of substances like histamine — leading to itchy, red, watery eyes; sneezing and upper respiratory congestion; coughing or wheezing; or itchy skin and hives.

Allergies are common triggers for asthma, a chronic airway disease that causes persistent cough, chest tightness, shortness of breath and wheezing.

Pets produce a variety of allergens that trigger allergies and asthma, and they can also carry other allergens (such as dust and molds). The specific proteins that trigger allergic reactions to dogs are called Canis familiaris, or Can f, proteins. In cats, they’re known as Felis domesticus, or Fel d, proteins. Can f proteins are found on dog dander and in saliva; Fel d proteins are mainly found in cat saliva. Scientists have also identified the main allergens in a variety of other pets, such as rabbits and hamsters.

Because pet dander can contaminate clothing, bags and other objects, it can make its way into schools and workplaces, so even people who have no known contact with pets can experience allergies.

A 9-year-old Barbet. Although some animals are touted as being hypoallergenic, that’s not really a thing. But you can still take steps to reduce allergic reactions in your home.

Thinking about an iguana or a macaw? Even reptiles and birds produce allergens.

Although some animals are touted as being hypoallergenic — suggesting that they won’t trigger allergies — that’s not really a thing.

There’s no difference in Can f production from one dog breed to another, but because dander is trapped by hair, dogs that shed hair infrequently (like poodles, labradoodles or Shih Tzus) might be less likely to trigger allergies, but it’s not a guarantee. Hairless dogs (like Xoloitzcuintlis, or Mexican hairless dogs) and cats (like Sphynxs) are very predisposed to skin problems, so they could end up shedding even more saliva-coated (thanks to their self-grooming behaviors) dander than a pet with hair.

Because many allergens from mammals look alike to the immune system, people can become sensitized to one pet species (such as cats) and then automatically be allergic to other pet species (such as rabbits), even if they’ve never been exposed to them. Thus, choosing a different furry friend might not resolve your allergy problem.

Thinking about an iguana or a macaw? Unfortunately, even reptiles and birds produce allergens — although if you’re allergic to a rabbit, an iguana might be a better choice than a cat. The bottom line is, there’s no such thing as an allergen-free pet, although studies are underway to determine whether gene-editing technology could make this a reality.

How to minimize allergic reactions to a pet

In some cases, it’s possible to reduce pet allergies without resorting to a pet-free household. Here are some steps you can take to minimize allergic reactions in your home.

Bathe your pet regularly. Wash your dog’s entire coat two to three times a week with a gentle, fragrance-free pet shampoo (such as an oatmeal-based shampoo), taking care to properly rinse it afterward. If you have a cat, wipe your cat down regularly with a clean, damp cloth. Not only does this reduce the amount of dander and saliva on your pet’s coat, but it also removes common environmental allergens, such as dust mites, molds and pollen.

Reduce allergens in the environment. If possible, replace carpet with hard flooring and vacuum regularly with a vacuum equipped with a HEPA filter. Wash pet bedding frequently. At least one household spray is available commercially that specifically neutralizes Fel d 1. Invest in a high-quality air purifier to reduce the amount of airborne dander.

Consider a special diet or supplement for your pet. Products are available for cats that contain proteins that bind to and neutralize Fel d 1. When fed for at least three weeks, one special diet was shown to reduce the amount of Fel d 1 in cat hair — but whether this reduces owner symptoms of allergy requires further study.

Minimize close contact. Keep your pet out of the bedroom, don’t let them lick you and as much as possible, keep them away from furniture and clothing (no cats in the laundry basket).

If you think your pet could be triggering your allergies or asthma, consider seeing an allergy and asthma specialist and getting tested for IgE to pet allergens. If you are diagnosed with a pet allergy, desensitization through injections or even medications placed under your tongue (sublingual immunotherapy) might be possible, and there might be other medications that can help you manage symptoms.

If you or someone in your house has known allergies or asthma and you’re hoping a breed advertised as hypoallergenic will be a good fit, talk to your doctor about getting tested for pet-specific allergies first. Because negative test results don’t rule out a pet allergy, you might also want to consider a trial with a friend or family member’s pet — or try fostering an animal from a shelter or rescue group, with the option of adoption at a later time. It’s the most considerate approach for both your own health and the health and happiness of the animal.

Have questions about your pet’s behavior, health or other issues? Submit them to Dr. Sykes at wapo.st/askavet.
