DOLLY PARTON
1946-2026

Dolly Parton viewed herself, first and foremost, as a songwriter.

A dazzling star who always got last laugh

NEW YORK TIMES

Dolly Parton, a rhinestone-studded, rags-to-riches daughter of Appalachia who for six decades ruled country music — and much of pop culture — with an outsize personality and down-home wit that enshrined her as one of America’s most cherished originals, died Tuesday in Nashville. She was 80.

Her death was announced in a video posted on social media by her nephew Bryan Seaver. A spokesperson said she died after a brief battle with cancer. Concerns about Ms. Parton’s health, which began last year as she postponed and later canceled a Las Vegas residency, grew to the point that she took to social media last fall to announce, “I ain’t dead yet.” In May, she said she had responded well to treatment after, as she put it, her immune and digestive systems “got all out of whack” in recent years.

From her hardscabble beginnings to glittering stardom, Ms. Parton’s life was the stuff of make-believe.

With her voluptuous figure, sparkly stage costumes, and blonde bouffant wigs, she was likened by writer Chet Flippo to the Big Rock Candy Mountain, the Depression-era symbol of abundance.

In 1978, everything, everywhere, was dripping disco and lit by mirrored balls. Andy Gibb and his brothers, the Bee Gees, dominated the charts, along with anything from the “Grease” soundtrack. Those country artists who managed to shoe-horn themselves into the Billboard Top 100 — such as Kenny Rogers with “The Gambler” — stuck to their twangy formula.

And then there was Dolly Parton. Never afraid to reinvent herself, laugh at herself, or simply join the party and have a bit of fun, Parton burst onto the dance floor with a disco song; yes, Dolly did disco. “(Baby) I’m Burning” was a lesson in fearlessness. The woman who, culturally speaking, grew up about as far from New York City and Studio 54 as possible arrived in a scarlet chiffon dress, took a spin around the dance floor, had a laugh, and scored a hit.

There’s a term for a musician who is able to hop from one genre to another. They’re called a crossover artist, and Parton was the ultimate crossover artist, not just musically, but anywhere else she decided to place one of her long red fin-

Head trauma has increasingly become an existential question for football. But just how common brain damage is among players was an open question until Tuesday, when an alarming newly published study found that one quarter of former NFL players who died over a recent six-year period had the neurodegenerative disease known as CTE.

And the numbers of chronic traumatic encephalopathy, the authors added, could be much higher, since their results are based on examining only those deceased players whose brains were donated for research.

The study, conducted by experts at Mass General Brigham, Boston University, and the Concussion & CTE Foundation, highlights the safety issues in a popular sport played by scores of college athletes — and the roughly 17,000 high school students in Massachusetts who began a new season of football practices on Monday.

“These [NFL] athletes didn’t just get their head impact exposure at the professional level,” said Dr. Daniel Daneshvar, the study’s lead author and chair of physical medicine and rehabilitation at MGB. “They got exposed to head impacts at the collegiate level, at the high school level, and in many cases, the youth level. All of those hits accumulated to increase their risk of having this pathology in their brain.”

Daneshvar called the findings a “wake-up call.”

Among the general population, CTE affects less than 1 percent of people. Based on the results of the study, then, on a 53-

Mamdani’s election, she said, proved that “this movement is not restricted to one city or one state.”

That was apt messaging, because this wasn’t Sunnyside, Queens, mind you, or Bushwick, Brooklyn. Valdez spoke from a

Study aims to uncover secrets of tick-borne syndrome

Researchers are launching what they say is a first-of-its-kind study of alpha-gal syndrome on Martha’s Vineyard to better understand the potentially deadly tick-borne allergy.

Martha’s Vineyard Hospital, a member of Mass General Brigham, will follow residents of the island who’ve been bitten by a lone star tick with the goal of identifying who develops the allergy and why. Researchers plan to track up to 300 participants over two years to examine how often the allergy occurs in those who are bitten, which factors may increase risk, and how people’s immune systems might change over time.

“Alpha-gal syndrome is an emerging health concern in our region, but there are still many unanswered questions about why some people develop the condition after a tick bite while others do not,” Dr. Jacob Lemieux, an infectious disease expert at MGB who is leading the study, said in a statement. “By following participants over time, we hope to better understand the biological and environmental factors that influence risk and generate information that can help guide future diagnosis, prevention and patient care.”

Alpha-gal syndrome, an allergy to a sugar molecule present in red meat and dairy products, has received widespread attention amid

ICE arrests jump to nearly 50,000 for July

Surge shows new tactics don't change agenda

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — US Immigration and Customs Enforcement arrested nearly 50,000 people in July, the highest single monthly arrest total during the second Trump administration, according to new figures.

The spike in immigration arrests shows that the administration has continued to advance its mass deportations agenda despite a shift in approach earlier this year from high-profile operations in large American cities that sparked a public outcry to arrests that have garnered less attention but have nonetheless been disruptive.

The July arrest tally of 49,571 marks a 15 percent jump from 43,021 arrests a month earlier and a 70 percent increase from 29,241 in February, in the aftermath of the Trump administration's enforcement surge in Minnesota, according to government data that was provided by ICE to the Deportation Data Project based at the University of California Berkeley and UCLA and analyzed by the Associated Press.

As part of the surging arrest numbers over recent weeks and bolstered by a hiring surge, ICE has made arrests at traffic stops. The agency has increasingly relied on state and local law enforcement partners who are assuming immigration enforcement duties. And ICE officers have started to arrest people from Haiti who've seen their protections from deportation stripped away.

The new numbers show the administration "didn't stop the enforcement," said Mark Krikorian of the Center for Immigration Studies, which advocates for immigration restrictions.

"They changed the tactics and are, if anything, being more effective."

Immigration arrests the month before President Trump returned to office hovered a little over 8,000, a figure largely made up of immigrants transferred from city or state jails and prisons and turned over to ICE to remove from the country. During Trump's first year back in office, the numbers started climbing as the administration loosened restrictions on where and whom ICE could arrest while it also infused the agency with billions of dollars.

By December, the number of arrests jumped to more than 40,177, according to the data, which was obtained through a Freedom of Information Act lawsuit. Homeland Security largely stopped reporting immigration enforcement data at the beginning of the second Trump administration, making the data from the Deportation Data Project one of the few insights into how the agency is operating.

In the aftermath of two fatal shootings in Minnesota in January that sparked protests, arrests began to fall in February. After remaining stagnant for months, the numbers surged in June and again in July.

The number of arrests made by state and local police departments who partner with ICE has dramatically increased over the last year. Those partnerships, which ICE has grown with the help of generous financial incentives for participating agencies, accounted for 6,500 arrests in July, or about 13 percent of the total, the data showed.

Texas and Florida accounted for nearly 20,000 of the July arrests, in a sign of how important those states have become to the Trump administration's mass deportation agenda. Both states have leaned heavily into those cooperation deals with ICE that allow local and state law enforcement to essentially operate as arms of federal immigration enforcement.

In his confirmation hearing earlier this year, Homeland Security Secretary Markwayne Mullin pledged to keep ICE out of the headlines, suggesting that the crackdown might take a softer approach. But his tenure has been marred by a number of fatal shootings of immigrants in encounters with ICE officers. And the figures show Mullin hasn't shifted the agency from Trump's vision for mass deportations.

BILLINGS, Mont. — A man killed eight of his relatives, including four children, as they gathered for Sunday dinner at a home in Billings, Mont., the father of two of the youngsters and a family spokesperson told the Associated Press.

The victims represented four generations of the blended

Rewards set for Indian Country cases

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — The Federal Bureau of Investigation has established a minimum reward of $25,000 in cases where people went missing or were killed in Indian Country, part of a broader effort to address high rates of violence affecting Native American communities.

The new minimum applies to more than 50 unsolved homicides and missing-person cases in tribal communities. Most of the cases are less than 10 years old, though a dozen have been unsolved for more than two decades, an AP analysis found.

Victims' families and experts are unsure the higher amounts will be enough to get tipsters to come forward, citing people's fears and distrust of the federal government.

"Everybody's scared in Oglala," said Lisa Carlow, whose father Patrick Carlow Sr. was found dead in his Pine Ridge Reservation home in 2023. "So to me it's like, OK, what do you guys know that you're not saying?"

The FBI investigates federal crimes on nearly 200 Native American reservations, along with the US Bureau of Indian Affairs. At the end of 2025, the FBI's National Crime Information Center recorded just under 1,500 active cases involving missing Native Americans.

Mich. AG releases Flint water report

LANSING, Mich. — Michigan Attorney General Dana Nessel said a report released Tuesday on the lead-water crisis in Flint, Mich., is the final step her office can take toward accountability, years after a state Supreme Court ruling shut down criminal cases against several people.

Flint residents suffered through years of health concerns after lead from old pipes leached into the city's drinking water once officials began drawing water from the Flint River to save money in 2014. Most of the 101-page report provides a history of the crisis, local and state officials' slow response, and the attempt to bring 42 felony and misdeemeanor charges against nine people, including former Republican governor Rick Snyder.

Nessel, a Democrat in her final term, said the report is meant to be a thorough public account of the criminal investigation, and she regretted that the details were never presented in court to juries.

"I hope this offering revealing the inner workings of our dedicated investigators and prosecutors who helmed this yearslong effort and the facts and evidence which guided them may tell one part of the story of the Flint water crisis," Nessel said.

Federal judge rejects Maxwell's bid for prison release

NEW YORK — Ghislaine Maxwell's bid to overturn her sex trafficking conviction and be freed from prison was rejected by a federal judge Tuesday who said the claims by Jeffrey Epstein's former girlfriend and longtime associate that new evidence had emerged were "demonstrably meritless."

Maxwell filed a habeas petition last December seeking to set aside her conviction and free her from a 20-year prison sentence, claiming exonerating information was withheld and false testimony presented at her trial, resulting in a "complete miscarriage of justice."

Judge Paul A. Engelmayer rejected her arguments, saying in his ruling they "all or almost all are frivolous" and that she had presented nothing that could upend the outcome of her trial.

"Nearly all its claims are procedurally barred; the overwhelming testimonial and documentary evidence adduced at trial conclusively established her guilt; and her petition's claims are demonstrably meritless, and generally based on speculation, distortions, and/or outright falsehoods," Engelmayer wrote.

A request for comment was sent to lawyers who represented Maxwell in the past.

2 unvaccinated people die from measles in Pa.

Officials wary of school start as outbreak spreads

By Teddy Rosenbluth

NEW YORK TIMES

Two unvaccinated people in Pennsylvania have died from measles, as a large outbreak there continues to spread, the state's Health Department reported Tuesday morning. They were the first measles deaths this year in the United States.

The deaths come during a record-setting year for measles in the United States: More cases have been reported in 2026 than in any year since the virus was declared eliminated in 2000.

Outbreaks have popped up all over the country. Lancaster County, Pa., where both patients lived, has been at the center of an outbreak that has so far hospitalized 70 people and infected more than 390, a third of whom were children. Some public health experts believe this number to be a vast undercount because the area is home to large Mennonite and Amish communities that tend to avoid traditional health care.

Health officials, citing privacy reasons, did not say whether the two patients were children or adults.

Measles deaths are extremely rare in the United States. But the virus's recent resurgence has caused a handful of fatalities. Two school-age children and one adult died last year from measles complications, the first such deaths in the country in a decade.

"These five deaths that have occurred since 2025 are extremely, extremely rare in the modern era," said Dr. Amesh Adalja, an infectious disease doctor at the Johns Hopkins Center for Health Security. "They're also a harbinger of what is happening as this virus takes hold again in the United States."

Public health experts are especially concerned because the school year is beginning, giving the virus more opportunities to spread among unvaccinated children, said Dr. David Kimberlin, a pediatric infectious disease specialist at the University of Alabama at Birmingham.

The best way to protect against measles is with two doses of a vaccine, which is usually administered to children as a combination measles-mumps-rubella, or MMR, shot. Two doses of the vaccine prevent more than 97 percent of measles infections.

Nationwide, routine childhood vaccination rates have been on the decline, dipping below the 95 percent benchmark that experts say is necessary to stave off outbreaks. Within some pockets of Lancaster County, the vaccination rate is much lower: Just a quarter of people within the local Amish community had been vaccinated against measles, according to a 2025 estimate. Since the start of the outbreak, the state has run 91 different pop-up vaccination clinics that have administered more than 1,000 doses of the MMR vaccine.

At a news conference, Governor Josh Shapiro of Pennsylvania, a Democrat, said the federal government was partly to blame for the hesitancy surrounding vaccinations.

"When the information we see coming from the federal government in some cases isn't driven by facts and by science," he said, "it makes it even more confusing for parents, and that has a serious impact."

This month, President Trump made the unsubstantiated claim that vaccinating against measles, mumps, and rubella at the same time could be "quite lethal." The nation's health secretary, Robert F. Kennedy Jr., has long underplayed the seriousness of measles infections and spread misinformation about vaccines.

Kennedy reached out to state officials Tuesday morning and offered to send staff to aid in controlling the outbreak, Shapiro said, adding that he had declined the offer.

"I was very, very blunt with him," Shapiro said. "I made very clear that his actions and the rhetoric that's coming from this administration are having a negative impact on communities across America, particularly right here in Pennsylvania."

The Department of Health and Human Services did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

While most measles cases are mild, roughly 1 in 5 unvaccinated people in the United States who contract the virus lands in the hospital. The virus is especially dangerous for children. Up to 3 out of 1,000 children with measles die from respiratory and neurological complications, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. Roughly 1 in 20 children with measles goes on to develop pneumonia, which is the leading cause of death from measles among children. In rare cases, children can also experience brain swelling, which can leave them with lifelong hearing damage or intellectual disabilities.

There are no treatments for measles, though researchers are trying to develop some.

Economically, Iran may have little to lose

Country’s leaders hope to weather new US squeeze

NEW YORK TIMES

Facing a fresh economic assault from the United States, Iran’s leaders are gambling that they can weather the coming storm and make the cost of their suffering felt in an oil-rich region that is critical to the global economy.

With Iran’s devastating economic crisis deepening, experts warn, Iranian leaders may feel they have little to lose by responding to US pressure with the kind of military escalation President Trump now seems keen to avoid.

“The harder Washington pushes third countries to sever Iran’s remaining lifelines, the stronger Tehran’s incentive becomes to demonstrate that participating in Iran’s isolation carries costs of its own,” said Sina Toossi, an Iran specialist at the Center for International Policy.

For months, as military confrontation has slowed, Iran’s struggle with Washington has amounted to a game of chicken over who can withstand the econom ic pain longer.

Iran’s oil revenues have been squeezed by a US naval blockade, while the Trump administration has contended with rising energy prices in the United States as Iran and its allies disrupt transit through the Strait of Hormuz and the Red Sea — vital waterways for oil and gas shipping.

The question of who will blink first looms large. On Monday, Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent announced a new package of measures that he said would further strangle the Iranian economy, though he was vague on how that would be achieved.

The success of the latest US effort will depend largely on whether the Trump administration can compel Iran’s main trade partners —including Turkey, Iraq, Russia, and China — to participate.

Iran’s top security chief, Mohsen Rezaei, has vowed that “not a single drop” of oil would leave the region if countries in the Persian Gulf joined the US effort, adding that they would be considered enemy states.

In earlier stages of the conflict, Iran has shown no qualms about dragging its Gulf neighbors into the fray, launching volleys of missiles and drones at

Yet the severity of the Iranian warnings underscores just how bad Iran’s current economic crisis is — and how it is worsening by the day.

The Iranian oil minister recently acknowledged that the oil exports that underpin the economy are close to zero because of the US blockade. And a report Monday by the country’s most prominent economic newspaper, Donya-e-Eghtesad, said the rial had depreciated 41 percent since December, when the already spiraling currency exchange rate sparked protests that morphed into weeks of nationwide unrest.

At the time, that posed one of the most serious challenges in decades to Iran’s authoritarian clerical rulers, and the security forces responded weeks later with a deadly crackdown.

Since then, inflation and unemployment have skyrocketed, with prices of everyday goods increasingly out of reach for many Iranians. The price of some medicines has risen by as much as 500 percent, according to local media reports.

The country also faces an ever-worsening gasoline supply crisis, caused in part by damage to Iran’s energy infrastructure from US-Israeli strikes and by the disruption of fuel imports due to the US naval blockade. A previous fuel crisis, in 2019, sparked large-scale protests in Iran.

On Tuesday, the BBC’s Persian-language service broadcast videos of frustrated Iranians arriving at gas station after gas station, only to discover there was no fuel, while other videos showed long queues of cars waiting to fill up.

Still, Iranian officials are projecting confidence that their leadership can survive.

The government “has been planning to confront US sanctions for a long time and is fully prepared for new sanctions,” Ali Madanizadeh, the economy minister, said late Monday. Iran had a secret two-year plan in place for dealing with such sanctions, he said, without elaborating.

Iran’s ability to withstand the latest US economic pressure campaign will depend on the attitude of its key trading partners. China, the world’s biggest buyer of Iranian oil, is unlikely to bend to Trump’s will, experts say. Much will also depend on Iran’s neighbors Turkey, a key trading partner and logistical hub, and Iraq, a huge market for Iranian exports.

Bird flu taking a toll in Australia

Disease now seen killing seals

By Laura Chung
NEW YORK TIMES

Bird flu is sweeping across Australia, devastating its unique birds and mammals, many of which are found nowhere else in the world.

Already, mass mortality events have killed more than 1,000 birds, and the disease has crossed into seals. Experts fear more deaths are likely.

Australia confirmed its first case of H5N1 in June in a migratory brown skua, a sub-Antarctic species on the country’s southern coast. Since then, the disease has rapidly spread.

To date, there have been 309 confirmed bird flu events, official data shows (the country is not counting individual bird cases, instead referring to events that could include one or more birds). Among the bird species to have died are greater crested terns, seagulls, and little penguins.

The state of South Australia has been the worst-hit, recording 194 events. More than 1,000 crested terns — a large coastal bird with a yellow bill — are believed to have died from the disease on three remote islands, the state’s leader said last week.

On Monday, the environment minister, Murray Watt, told the national broadcaster: “We are likely to see mass mortalities of birds and mammals. And I know that is a very distressing thing for Australians to hear, but we also need to be realistic.”

So far, the disease has not been detected in poultry or on farms, according to the government, and the risk to humans remains low. People who come across affected animals have been told not to touch them, but to photograph and report the sighting via official hotlines.

Euan Ritchie, a professor of wildlife ecology at Deakin University, said that, while the disease had not been in Australia long, the speed of its spread was concerning.

“We have a feeling of dread that we’re only about to see the beginning of it now and it’s about to get far worse,” he said.

He added that Australia’s wildlife had evolved in isolation for millions of years, creating animals found nowhere else, such as the Australian sea lion, which is considered vulnerable, with fewer than 10,000 adults in the wild.

But this isolation also meant that the animals were more at risk of contracting new pathogens because they had not developed any immunity.

The Australian government began vaccinating at-risk bird species this month. Among those receiving the vaccination will be 5,000 little penguins in the state of Victoria. They are easy to vaccinate because they waddle from the ocean to their burrows each evening.

Millions in funding have also been allocated to combat the disease, including increased surveillance to ensure early detection and response.

But some conservationists and experts have criticized the government for being too slow to roll out vaccines and have called for increased investment in habitat protections.

H5N1 has infected a range of mammals, including cows, cats, foxes, and raccoons around the world. But marine mammals have been particularly hard hit. The disease killed at least 24,000 South American sea lions along the continent’s coasts in less than a year in 2023.

In Australia, authorities confirmed the first case of H5N1 in a long-nosed fur seal in South Australia last week. A second seal was suspected to have died from the disease Monday.

A vaccine has not yet been approved for use in Australian mammals.

US cuts Syria from terrorism sponsors list

AMMAN, Jordan — The United States has lifted the last of its crippling economic sanctions on Syria after the Treasury Department removed the country from its list of state sponsors of terrorism.

The move was welcomed on Tuesday by Syrian officials, who view it as a crucial step toward reconstruction after the end of the country’s brutal civil war of nearly 14 years.

“Great people of Syria, you have done it again,” President Ahmad al-Sharaa of Syria said in comments carried by Syrian state media. “Sanctions have been lifted and restrictions removed. I ask God to help us serve you.”

The United States designated Syria a state sponsor of terror in the late 1970s, when the country was ruled by the dictator Hafez Assad, largely because of his regime’s support for Palestinian armed groups.

Additional US sanctions were imposed during the rule of Assad’s son and successor, Bashar Assad. He was ousted in December 2024, during the civil war, by a coalition of rebel factions led by al-Sharaa.

The fall of the Assad regime left Syrians optimistic about the country’s economic prospects and hoping for a quick reintegration into the global market under an interim government. Yet that recovery has been slow and bumpy, hampered in part by lingering US sanctions.

In recent months, Syrians have faced high inflation and rising food and fuel prices that have stoked discontent with the government.

The removal of the state sponsor of terror designation Monday came after a US congressional review process and after Syria joined the Global Coalition to Defeat the Islamic State, according to the State Department. The United States also revoked the terrorism designation for Hayat Tahrir al-Sham, a rebel group that was headed by al-Sharaa and that was previously known as the Nusra Front, the State Department said.

The United States had already removed other punitive sanctions that had been imposed on Syria during the civil war.

Chinese artist sentenced to 3 years

A Chinese court on Tuesday sentenced a prominent New York-based artist, Gao Zhen, to three years in prison for making irreverent sculptures of Mao Zedong more than 15 years ago, according to his wife.

The Sanhe City People’s Court in Hebei province found Gao guilty of slandering one of the country’s heroes, highlighting the shrinking space for expression under China’s leader, Xi Jinping.

The case of Gao, who had emigrated to the United States and was detained in Beijing two years ago while visiting family, underlined the opacity of China’s legal system. The 70-year-old artist was tried during a one-day secret hearing in March that his family and US diplomats were barred from attending. He was found guilty and sentenced during Tuesday’s hearing, which two of Gao’s other brothers were able to attend.

Gao is the elder of the artistic duo known as the Gao Brothers, who became famous during the early 2000s for their satirical and provocative takes on politically sensitive topics such as the Cultural Revolution, a decade of political turmoil unleashed by Mao, as well as the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre.

The three-year sentence, the maximum Gao could have received, means that he will serve one more year in prison after two years’ detention. The artist plans to appeal the court’s decision.

UN, Red Cross urge ‘killer robot’ rules

GENEVA — The United Nations and the International Committee of the Red Cross on Tuesday ratcheted up a joint call for countries to adopt bans and restrictions on the use of autonomous weapons systems — often known as “killer robots” — warning that “the risks have intensified.”

Building on an initial appeal three years ago and international talks on the issue for years, the appeal stops short of calling for a blanket ban, but notes that such weapons systems are being developed — though the UN and Red Cross haven’t confirmed their use on the battlefield.

The organizations said, however, that civilians need to be protected for when that day may come.

“We are now dangerously close to crossing a moral red line: The autonomous targeting of humans by machines,” said UN Geneva spokesperson Alessandra Vellucci, reading a joint statement by UN Secretary General António Guterres and ICRC President Mirjana Spoljaric.

“Today, we renew this call with even greater urgency,” the statement said. “The fundamental concerns remain unchanged, but the risks have intensified.”

The two international organizations say the development of weapons technology at “record speed” has strained the international rules system and widened the gap between technological capacities and regulatory constraints.

Tornado rips through towns in southern France

PARIS — An unusually strong tornado tore through southwestern France, ripping up roofs and leaving dozens of people injured, the authorities said Tuesday.

“A tornado of rare intensity struck Aude late yesterday afternoon,” Laurent Nuñez, the French interior minister, said on social media, referring to a prefecture in the Occitanie region.

The tornado arrived Monday, battering towns and villages in the area, according to Météo-France, the national weather agency. At least 39 people were injured, two of whom were in critical condition, said Emmanuelle Plantier-Lemarchand, secretary-general of the Aude prefecture. Regional authorities issued a warning, but the direction had been hard to forecast, Plantier-Lemarchand told French broadcaster Ici Occitanie.

“The phenomenon that struck us was an intense, violent, and traumatic phenomenon, but it was difficult to predict,” Plantier-Lemarchand noted. Firefighters were combing the region for potential victims, authorities said.

Israel remains silent on journalists killed in Gaza

Officials refuse to provide details of investigation

By Sam Mednick

TEL AVIV — It’s been a year since Israeli soldiers killed 22 Palestinians, including journalists and rescue workers, in a double strike on a hospital in Gaza. No one has been held accountable.

Israeli officials said the target was a suspected Hamas camera on the roof of Nasser Hospital. Among those killed were Reuters cameraman Hussam al-Masri and Mariam Dagga, a visual journalist who worked for the Associated Press and other news organizations.

Despite repeated requests by AP, the army hasn’t provided details about the investigation or a timeline for when it could be completed. Rights groups say Israel rarely holds troops accountable for killing Palestinians, pointing to long investigations that rarely lead to prosecution.

As global outrage over the Aug. 25, 2025, strikes grew, the Israeli military said that in addition to taking out the camera, six of those killed were linked to Hamas, without providing evidence.

But an Israeli soldier, speaking on condition of anonymity for fear of retribution, now says the military could find no evidence linking the camera, which belonged to al-Masri, to Hamas. The soldier, who was privy to discussions surrounding the military’s response, said none of the six was the intended target of the strikes.

AP sent detailed questions to the military about the allegations, as well as other questions about the strikes. The military didn’t address the questions but said the incident is being examined and findings will be transferred to the Military Advocate

A journalist on Tuesday held up a photo of Mariam Dagga, who was killed in an Israeli strike on Nasser Hospital one year ago.

General’s Corps to reach a verdict on whether to open a criminal investigation. It didn’t provide a timeline.

The army said it would not comment on details while the incident was under review.

AP reported at the time that one of the six Israel said was linked to Hamas wasn’t on the hospital’s list of casualties and two others were medical or emergency personnel. That, along with the soldier’s account, raises serious questions about Israel’s rationale for the strikes.

Why did troops fail to identify the cameraman as al-Masri, even though journalists were known to film at the hospital? Why did they strike a second time, causing most of the deaths and raising accusations of a “double tap” attack on first responders, which would be a war crime?

AP and Reuters released a statement Tuesday calling again for Israel to provide a full explanation of the strikes. The news organizations also called on Israel to give journalists access to Gaza to support colleagues who have covered the war from the beginning.

“A year later, we remain devastated by their deaths and are still searching for answers from the Israeli authorities about what happened,” the statement read.

Also Tuesday, UN Secretary General Antonio Guterres’s spokesperson, Stephane Dujarric, told UN reporters: “There will need to be accountability for the civilians killed, for the journalists killed, and we will continue to call for that.”

News agencies like Reuters and AP supplied live video footage to newsrooms around the world from the hospital, one of the few functioning in Gaza at the time. AP repeatedly informed the army that its journalists were there.

The first strike killed al-Masri and another person. As other journalists, including Dagga, and rescue workers rushed up an external staircase to help the wounded and document what happened, the military struck again, killing 20. Based on footage and eyewitnesses, none was armed. In all, Israel struck the hospital four times using high-explosive tank shells.

Israeli officials afterward said Hamas was using the camera to observe nearby troops. They alleged “suspicious behavior” around the camera, but the only example they gave was that a towel draped over the camera and the person filming appeared to be an effort at concealment.

Al-Masri routinely covered equipment with a white cloth to protect it from the sun and dust, a common practice among journalists in Gaza and other hot climates.

Last week, the army announced criminal investigations into two other high-profile attacks by its troops in Gaza — the 2024 killing of 5-year-old Hind Rajab and her family, and the 2025 killing of 15 paramedics. It cleared troops in three other attacks that killed international aid group workers.

The soldier was connected to AP through Breaking the Silence, a group founded over two decades ago by Israeli veterans that collects testimony from soldiers and is critical of Israel’s actions in the Palestinian territories.

The soldier said after high-profile strikes that kill civilians without clear military purpose, army officials search for militant links among those killed.

Breaking the Silence said its testimonies show there is a “retroactive incrimination process” in which Palestinians who are killed are automatically counted as militants, even when unarmed.

Retroactive incrimination is used as a “near automatic justification for every bullet, shell, or missile fired, and as a tool used to avoid carrying out real investigations,” Nadav Weiman, the group’s executive director, said.

Israeli troops have killed 207 Palestinian reporters in Gaza since Hamas’s Oct. 7, 2023, attack ignited the war, according to the New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists. Israel has barred foreign journalists from entering Gaza, giving Palestinian journalists a critical role.

Sara Qudah, CPJ’s Middle East and North Africa regional director, said Israel has a responsibility to conduct a prompt, transparent investigation. “When journalists can be killed without credible accountability, it becomes harder and more dangerous for the press to document conflicts and for the public to know what is happening,” she said.

The lack of answers has been agonizing for families.

Ezz al-Din al-Masri said he doesn’t understand why his brother, Hussam, was killed. “Unfortunately, we found that the blood of journalists in Gaza is cheap ... as if the rules protecting journalists do not apply,” he said.

Tanks struggle in Ukraine war

Western weapons prove no match for cheap drones

By Cassandra Vinograd and Oleksandr Chubko
NEW YORK TIMES

KHARKIV REGION, Ukraine — The screens covering a command post wall served up live video feeds from bomber drones, a ground drone trundling down a mud path, and surveillance drones scoping out a burning house — a catalog of modern warfare.

One thing missing from the picture were the tanks that gave the 33rd Separate Mechanized Brigade’s battalion its name.

Once Ukraine’s most sought-after Western weapons, tanks now mostly sit idle, hidden in forests and collecting cobwebs. The $10 million machines, procured with great fanfare, proved no match for cheap drones that now dominate the battlefield. Yet Ukraine still maintains them and trains soldiers to use them, while trying to imagine new ways to deploy them.

“We’re making virtually no use of armored vehicles,” Oleksandr Syrskyi, who until last month was Ukraine’s top general, said recently. “This raises the question: How can we neutralize this advantage enjoyed by drones and give our armor a new lease on life?”

That question was at the heart of a clash over war strategy that led Syrskyi to be relieved of his command last month.

Some of Ukraine’s premier tank divisions are not waiting around for the answer.

Tank crews should not be stagnant, said a fresh-faced commander in the 33rd, who, like most soldiers interviewed, gave only his call sign, Morpheus, in keeping with military protocol. That’s why, he said, he tells his battalion that they need to learn something new.

Ukraine started asking for Western-made tanks almost immediately after Russia’s full-scale invasion in February 2022, when they seemed essential. Ukraine’s allies resisted sending them until January 2023, when Britain, Germany, and the United States changed course following fraught negotiations and public pressure.

The 33rd Brigade was formed in part to receive those Western tanks. But by the time they entered the fight late that spring, cheap drones were already inflicting a deadly toll and were able to strike tanks at their most vulnerable points.

Russian forces started covering their tanks with antir drone meshes and cages. “People laughed at them back then, saying they were making BBQ grills,” recalled a tank maintenance chief with the 33rd whose call sign is Energetyk. “But they were heading in the right direction.”

Ukraine followed suit, adding protective cages and reactive armor in hopes of maintaining tanks’ relevance.

But soon both sides stopped using heavy armor for assaults. Tank crews must remain ready, said a company commander, call sign Fin, so his men stay busy training, maintaining the tanks, and welding on new protections. In combat or not, there is no rest, said Fin, 26, fiddling with the Virgin Mary charm on his black rope bracelet.

The 33rd carries out live-fire exercises every two weeks or so, to keep its skills fresh. One sunny morning, between sunflower fields, troops positioned a tank and set up targets in the distance.

Commanders sat with other soldiers under a makeshift shade, snacking on seeds and sharing a liter of Pepsi.

Yuri Kosenko, 57, had just come off two weeks in a front line dugout that he said smelled like dampness and mold. There had been no tank fighting but so many “mosquitoes,” he said — rubbing his arm then pointing to the sky to make clear he meant both the biting kind and the exploding kind — that he had to carry a drone detector to the latrine.

Like most soldiers interviewed, he said he was fine without combat engagements because he had seen enough battle. “War is war. There’s nothing to like about it,” the soldier said as shells were loaded into the tank.

Soon the crew climbed in and spun the gun around. The first few rounds were off the mark. Orders went back and forth by radio, requesting adjustments.

Three more shells fired, each setting off a blast that made only half the soldiers flinch.

“We know,” a crew member replied.

The Pepsi bottle was nearly empty by that point. A tank driver, Mechan, took out pancakes filled with shredded chicken to share, brought back from his recent leave.

Today Energetyk, 57, works in a forest in the Kharkiv region, well behind the front line. There, birds chirp, the air smells like wood and only upon a close look can camouflage netting be spotted among the trees.

German-made Leopard tanks sit beneath the nets, their turrets turned backward in the “travel position.” Some await repairs or maintenance like oil changes. Others, like one covered in spider webs, are parked in reserve for combat, though those orders have stopped coming.

Energetyk oversaw a crew swapping out the engine of a tank that had hit a mine and caught fire. Another tank had taken a drone strike to the turret, he said, pointing to its parking spot as he set off down a mud track through the woods with ammunition slung over his shoulder.

Gang attack leaves 47 dead in Haiti

More than 50 held hostage in mass kidnapping

PORT-AU-PRINCE — At least 47 people were killed and more than 50 others kidnapped when armed men attacked a once-peaceful community near Haiti’s capital earlier this week, the United Nations said Tuesday.

It is believed to be one of the largest mass kidnappings in Haiti in recent years, and one gang leader is threatening to kill the hostages if authorities kill any gang members as they try to secure the community nestled in the hills above Port-au-Prince.

Sunday’s attack on Kenscoff pierced the belief that security in the troubled Caribbean country was improving.

“This is a major political and security test, for the government, for the police, and for the international mission,” said Romain Le Cour Grandmaison, head of the Haiti Observatory at Transnational Organized Crime.

He said the threat of executing hostages is a trap: If forces don’t act, they’ve failed to protect them; if they do and hostages die, the gangs will blame the state.

Kenscoff resident Marc Paul,

42, said gangs kidnapped his brother, stepmother, stepfather, and two cousins. He said his 16-year-old niece was kidnapped and raped but was able to escape and has reunited with him.

“I had to run over bodies,” he said as he recalled how he fled the attack. “I can’t sleep knowing all these people died.”

Paul and his family had already lost their home to a previous gang attack in January 2025, but he said it was not as violent as Sunday’s attack. Paul was upset about the video the gangs posted: “My brother is probably going to die.”

In a video posted on social media, the gang leader threatened Vladimir Paraison, director of Haiti’s National Police.

“Paraison, if any of our soldiers are hurt, I will kill all of them,” he said, referring to the hostages.

The gang member identified himself as Izo 2, a reference to Izo, or Johnson André, one of Haiti’s most powerful gang leaders.

Kenson Paul, the 17-year-old nephew of Marc Paul, said he managed to escape the attackers.

“They have not called us to let us know what they want,” he said of the gang. “I worry for my family’s life.”

Le Cour Grandmaison said the aim of Sunday’s attack could be to force Haiti’s police and the UN-backed gang suppression force to disperse even more of their limited resources.

“They don’t have enough personnel,” Le Cour Grandmaison said in a phone interview. “If you force them to deploy more troops, it would inevitably be at the expense of other areas.”

The attack might also just be a show of force and a message to Haiti’s government and police as the country prepares to hold general elections Dec. 13 for the first time in more than a decade.

“This is a message to the government and the police that their claims of protection do not match reality,” Le Cour Grandmaison said. “The gangs are saying: When we choose to attack, we can, and we will succeed.”

The first major attack on Kenscoff occurred in January 2025, and since then, there have been sporadic attacks in the mountains surrounding the city center.

But Sunday’s attack was the largest yet. At least five of the 47 people killed were children, according to the United Nations Integrated Office in Haiti, known as BINUH.

UN Secretary General António Guterres condemned the attack on Tuesday, noting that 22 of the victims were reportedly executed in a church compound where they had sought shelter: “The relentless gang attacks on communities and the loss of lives underscore the alarming security conditions in Haiti,” he said.

US judge delays Pan Am 103 trial

Victims’ families continue long wait for justice

By Philip Marcelo
ASSOCIATED PRESS

MONTAUK, N.Y. — The monumental collection of 76 statues in Suse Lowenstein’s backyard captures the moment she and other women learned their loved ones were killed when Pan Am Flight 103 was blown out of the sky over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988.

Each nude, life-size creation represents a mother, wife, sister, or other female relative in her darkest grief — weeping, praying, screaming, collapsing.

“The grief, everything, stays the same, just like this. This is always here,” the 82-year-old artist said, walking through the rust-hued monuments in the New York beach town of Montauk recently. “And so, the feelings don’t go away.”

Lowenstein, whose son, Alex, was aboard Flight 103, is among many who have waited nearly four decades to see the culprits of the bombing — one of the deadliest terrorist attacks against US citizens — face justice in a US courtroom. Now, they’ll have to keep waiting.

The terrorism trial of the alleged bombmaker, Abu Agila Mohammad Mas’ud Khair Al-Marimi, was set to begin Wednesday in Washington, D.C., but was postponed Monday. A judge cited the discovery of new evidence, though she didn’t say what that evidence was.

Al-Marimi, a former Libyan intelligence officer who had been imprisoned in Libya for years, is the first to be prosecuted on American soil in connection with the attack on the New York-bound flight, which killed 270 people, a majority of them Americans. Eleven of the dead were on the ground in Lockerbie.

The case had a breakthrough in 2017, when US officials obtained a 2012 interview in which they say that Al-Marimi admitted building the bomb and working with two conspirators to carry out the attack. According to an FBI affidavit, he said the operation was ordered by Libyan intelligence and that the late Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi thanked the team afterward.

Aphrodite Tsairis, whose daughter, Alexia, perished on Flight 103, had planned to travel to Washington for the start of the trial, along with other family members of victims. She said the delay wasn’t surprising.

“From the very beginning, we had to fight adversity,” the 83-year-old central New Jersey resident said Tuesday. “So it is not surprising to hear there are more impediments to justice being carried out.”

Tsairis said the court proceeding was more of “an academic exercise” than an emotional journey, at this stage in her life. She and other family members of victims had attended the 2000 trial in the Netherlands, which resulted in the conviction of one of Al-Marimi’s alleged accomplices and the acquittal of another.

“This isn’t about closure,” Tsairis said. “This is more about putting the period at the end of the sentence kind of thing.”

She said she’s found solace over the years working with her husband on The Alexia, a grant program supporting documentary photographers and filmmakers at Syracuse University. Their 20-year-old daughter, who had dreams of becoming a documentary photographer, was among the 35 Syracuse students returning from a semester abroad on the ill-fated flight.

Stephanie Bernstein, who lost her husband, Michael, in the attack, said it’s “astonishing” that evidence apparently not known by either side in the case would emerge all these decades later and on the eve of the trial.

“It shows that there is still information out there, so that makes the delay somewhat less difficult to accept,” said the 75-year-old Maryland resident, who is currently vice president of Victims of Pan Am Flight 103, an advocacy group formed in the wake of the bombing. “We are hopeful that it will increase our knowledge of what happened.”

Suse Lowenstein’s son, Lucas, hopes whatever new information emerges can finally put to bed any lingering theories.

“You can really go down a rabbit hole in wondering, ‘What did we miss? Is there more?’” he said. “At this point, I feel that they got the right people. I don’t believe there’s more to it.”

The 57-year-old northern New Jersey resident says his approach to life fundamentally changed when he lost his brother. The two had been students together at Syracuse University, just one year apart.

“My parents more or less died that day,” said Lucas Lowenstein, who named his son in honor of his late brother. “So I knew then — and know now — that I have to outlive them. I got to be there for them.”

Out in Montauk, Suse Lowenstein has tried to stay out of the twists and turns of the criminal case. Instead, she finds peace among the constant reminders of what was lost on Dec. 21, 1988.

Her son Alex’s bright red jacket rests on a hook by the door of her art studio. The coat was recovered amid the wreckage and carefully cleaned by Lockerbie residents, like many other possessions returned to grieving families. Lowenstein says she does it whenever she does welding work.

Hegseth’s purge handicaps Army

The loss of top generals leaves service rudderless

By Greg Jaffe, Eric Schmitt, and Helene Cooper
NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON — A series of firings and feuds initiated by Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth has left the Army essentially rudderless as it struggles to deal with the threat posed by cheap, deadly drones and missiles that have pounded US bases in the Middle East.

The Army has not had a chief of staff, the service’s top officer, since Hegseth fired General Randy George without explanation in April, and there are no signs that he is close to filling the position, said current and former officials speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss sensitive personnel matters. Hegseth has forced out at least three senior officers who had been viewed as potential successors to George.

Army Secretary Daniel Driscoll, the service’s top civilian leader, is also expected to leave the administration in the next few months and has already moved out of the large family house that he was renting in Fort Myer, outside Washington, D.C., officials said.

The turmoil comes as the Army, the military’s largest service, faces its busiest period since the Iraq and Afghanistan wars. Army air defense soldiers are playing the leading role in defending US troops in the Middle East from increasingly sophisticated Iranian missile attacks. The Army’s command in Europe is providing critical intelligence and other support to Ukraine as it fights to hold off a larger Russian force.

Until recently, Driscoll was widely seen as a potential candidate to replace Hegseth if he decided to step down or fell out of favor with President Trump.

Driscoll and George had worked together to prepare the Army for a battlefield teeming with drones. Late last year, the White House asked Driscoll to play a lead role in its push to secure a peace deal that would end the war in Ukraine.

Those peace efforts have largely stalled, the rapid modernization push is being scaled back, and Driscoll is barely on speaking terms with Hegseth, officials said. His impending departure was reported earlier by The Wall Street Journal.

Beyond George, Hegseth has fired or forced out a half-dozen senior officers — a generation of the Army’s most combat-hardened leaders — thinning the service’s top ranks for the next several years, officials said.

A long-term worry is that the firings send a message that officers who provide frank military advice or fail ideological litmus tests have no place in a force that is supposed to be nonpartisan, military and congressional officials said.

Hegseth’s office referred questions about the firings and lack of senior leadership to the Army. The Army declined to comment. In a statement, the service downplayed the impact of the firings. “Army leaders exemplify the highest standards of duty, selflessness, and professional excellence,” said Cynthia O. Smith, an Army spokesperson. “They are actively driving the Army’s mission forward, ensuring that our strategic objectives are met, our modernization efforts remain on track, and our global readiness is never compromised.”

One measure of the vacuum at the top of the Army is the number of four-star generals serving in its ranks. As recently January 2025, when Hegseth took office, there were 10 four-star generals on active duty. The service currently has five, the fewest in decades.

In Mass., hoping Mamdani rubs off

► MAMDANI

While it makes sense the Mamdani playbook would find a home in such a bastion of progressive politics as Cambridge, candidates for other offices are also putting the approach to the test in more mainstream parts of the state where a Democrat campaigning under a socialist banner would face a more uncertain reception.

On the North Shore in the Democratic primary for the Sixth Congressional District, two candidates have name-checked Mamdani on social media in hopes of boosting their own bids for Congress. An attorney running to be Norfolk County’s top prosecutor has mimicked Mamdani’s branding, down to the font and color scheme his campaign uses. And in Somerville, a state representative running for Senate dubbed Mamdani “America’s Favorite Mayor” in a cooking video about affordable housing.

They, and others around the country, are hoping to join the groundswell of democratic socialists’ victories in Colorado, Florida, and elsewhere that effectively sprouted in New York a year ago with Mamdani’s victory.

“It really does show that there is a real hunger for this kind of politics, for democratic socialist politics,” said Aaron Fernando, a 25-year-old from Astoria who works as a chief of staff for the assembly member who succeeded Mamdani in Albany after he became mayor.

Fernando admitted it feels “frankly bizarre” to hear Mamdani’s name resonate with voters outside New York City. Still, he said, “Cambridge seems like a natural place for that to continue.”

He was among the activists and volunteers from New York City who traveled north to Cambridge to knock on doors for MacKay, a democratic socialist running against state Representative Marjorie Decker — a progressive Democrat herself, who edged MacKay in a recount two years ago.

Brion Rock, who is originally from Boston and now lives in Washington Heights, said he traveled to Cambridge after meeting MacKay in New York last year. Rock, 34, served as a lead field organizer for Mamdani’s campaign.

“The fight for dignity for workers, the fight for people power — it’s not a New York thing . . . it’s a human thing,” said Rock, who wore a red New York City Democratic Socialists jersey for the event. “The solidarity from Boston to New York is cool to see.”

Maeve Andersen, a New York-based political data strategist who also worked for MacKay’s 2024 campaign, conducted electoral research for the New York City Democratic Socialists of America, or DSA, chapter during the Mamdani campaign.

She said “Zohran is the peak example” of a blueprint for DSA-endorsed, union-backed candidates winning office.

The election of Mamdani, she said, “is not the end of it, and it wasn’t even the start.”

Erika Uytterhoeven, a Somerville state representative running in a crowded Democratic primary for state Senate, recently posted a tutorial on making a Korean seafood stew while talking about affordable housing. The video kicked off with an image of Mamdani’s face inside an animated pink heart.

“If America’s favorite mayor can do it, we can too,” said Uytterhoeven, the only current member of the state Legislature who’s a DSA member. (The Boston DSA chapter, though, narrowly voted against backing her in the race.)

Bethany Andres-Beck, a software engineer and activist running in a six-way Democratic primary to replace Representative Seth Moulton in Massachusetts’s Sixth Congressional District, recently posted a TikTok video of themselves eating a cone at Richardson’s Ice Cream in their hometown of Middleton.

“Not all socialists can be mayor of New York City,” the caption read. “Some of us have to hold it down in Middleton.”

One of Andres-Beck’s primary opponents, Jamie Belsito, has referenced Mamdani, Valdez, and a slate of other democratic socialist and progressive candidates in her own campaigning messaging, too. “This is the future of the Democratic party,” she wrote.

Jim Barakat, a public defender running in a seven-way race for Norfolk district attorney, has modeled his campaign website to match Mamdani’s, down to the unique font and striking blue-and-yellow color scheme. He said the branding is, obviously, intentional.

“Zohran Mamdani has demonstrated that progressive candidates can break through,” the Braintree Democrat said. “I want voters to immediately understand what I stand for.”

Strategists and experts say, however, that the outreach to voters must also feel organic. And while liberal cities with younger demographics, such as Cambridge, may resonate with the Mamdani association, not every community will.

“It’s an aesthetic that works for urban New York City,” said Travis Ridout, codirector of the Wesleyan Media Project, which studies and tracks political advertising. “Would I try this in rural Tennessee or Montana? Maybe that’s not the right aesthetic.

There may be something geographic about this.”

Ridout, author of “Political Advertising in the United States,” said New York Representative Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez sent similar messages in her first campaign in 2018, using bold, slanted typeface and design that evoked old-school union posters and farmworker movements. The aesthetic, he noted, was then mimicked around the country.

“You are trying to convey you are a different type of politician,” he said. “Branding matters in politics.”

Ariana Jasmine Afshar, a New York-based content creator who made short-form videos for Mamdani’s campaign, said part of its strength was to bring together creators with followers like herself to help grow his social media presence and, subsequently, his supporter base.

“Watching his rise and how successful he’s been . . . I think it’s lit a fire for a lot of people that it’s possible,” Afshar said, noting how other Democrats, including New York congressional nominee Darializa Avila Chevalier and Michigan Senate nominee Abdul El-Sayed, have taken to Mamdani’s online approach. “The model has been proven to work.”

However, others warned, branding doesn’t always work.

Tobe Berkovitz, a professor emeritus of advertising at Boston University, said Mamdani proved skilled in using modern techniques and style online, but “not everybody is.”

“If you sort of become a pseudo-Mamdani, it might or might not work,” said Berkovitz, who has consulted on presidential, congressional, and gubernatorial campaigns. “It’s a TikTok world, and that means communicating parasocially to the voter: Being brief, being powerful. Not everybody can do that.”

MacKay rejects that they are trying to be Mamdani. They met Valdez over a decade ago canvassing for Bernie Sanders’ first presidential campaign, and stayed connected through the United Auto Workers, which represents workers across a wide range of industries, including colleges and universities. MacKay worked as a data science teaching fellow at Harvard, and Valdez — the Democratic nominee for New York’s Seventh Congressional District — worked as a visual arts program assistant at Columbia University.

Valdez, speaking last Saturday in Cambridge, said voters are feeling a “real, deep dissatisfaction with the establishment,” regardless of whether they have a New York ZIP code.

“It’s creating a wave of progressive victories all over the country,” she said, “that will trickle down to the local level as well.”

Trump’s mail voting efforts face challenges

Court’s ruling adds uncertainty to midterms

By Adam Sella and Abbie VanSickle
NEW YORK TIMES

WASHINGTON — President Trump has been trying to restrict mail voting. The Supreme Court has now weighed in for the first time on an executive order on mail-in voting Trump issued in March.

But the ruling and the slew of challenges to Trump’s order are confusing. No one is sure exactly what happens from here, or how it may affect the midterms.

The executive order directs the US Postal Service to restrict mail-in ballots. It also authorizes the Department of Homeland Security to create state-by-state citizen lists to help determine voter eligibility.

For now, it appears Homeland Security can proceed with compiling lists. But another court order blocks the Postal Service from moving ahead with plans to restrict who can receive a ballot by mail.

Here is where things stand, and why it matters.

Trump is trying to leverage the federal government to control mail voting.

Trump has long falsely claimed that mail-in balloting leads to fraud, and he blames a pandemic-era increase in the practice in 2020 with his loss in that year’s presidential election.

The president signed an executive order on March 31 directing the Postal Service to deliver ballots only in states that hand over voter data to the federal government.

The order also called on the Department of Homeland Security to compile state-by-state citizenship lists that could be used to help determine voter eligibility. The US has never created a central citizenship registry.

The Supreme Court acted Monday, but only preliminarily.

Dividing along ideological lines, the Supreme Court on Monday found that a legal challenge by Democratic state attorneys general was premature because the government had not yet finalized its plans.

The court did not weigh in on the legal merits of the executive order. And the justices cautioned that they had not determined whether the president’s directive would “necessarily be lawful” once those plans were complete.

The Trump administration had asked the Supreme Court to weigh in after a federal judge in Massachusetts temporarily blocked key parts of the executive order.

Government lawyers told the Supreme Court that the lower court had acted prematurely because the agencies had yet to issue final rules on how to carry out the president’s order.

The challengers — Democratic state attorneys general — had argued that the president’s order would confuse voters and probably disenfranchise people who rely on voting by mail in the midterm elections.

There is a lot more legal action to come.

The legal fight over Trump’s executive order remains a fluid, high-stakes battle with multiple lawsuits pending in lower courts.

The Supreme Court is likely to be asked soon to weigh in again, and the legal issues are likely ultimately to be resolved by the justices. It is not clear what cases will be the ones to get the justices’ attention next.

The challenge by state attorneys general that the Supreme Court decided on Monday could come back. The states that sued are likely to argue that the Postal Service’s action Friday made their case ripe.

Another case that is being closely watched is a challenge by voting rights organizations. In League of Women Voters of Massachusetts v. Trump, a federal judge also temporarily blocked the part of the executive order that involves the Postal Service. That block appears to remain in place, meaning that the Postal Service cannot, for now, move forward with its plan.

COLUMBIA, S.C.— Senator Darline Graham won the Republican nomination to replace her late brother POLITICAL NOTEBOOK Lindsey Graham on South Carolina’s general election ballot.

Darline Graham defeated Representative Ralph Norman in Tuesday’s special Republican primary runoff, two weeks after they were the top two finishers in a 10-way primary.

Despite being a political unknown, Darline Graham bested some of South Carolina’s top political names in the special election spun up after her brother’s sudden death last month. She was appointed by Governor Henry McMaster to serve out the remaining months of her late brother’s current term and swiftly notched an endorsement from President Trump, who encouraged her to enter the race for a full term and campaigned for her in the state last week.

Graham will face Democratic nominee Annie Andrews in November.

Among the unknowns going into Tuesday was whether Trump’s backing would be enough to boost the novice candidate with the famous last name, but whose political positions were previously unknown, across the finish line.

After losing a Senate advocate when Lindsey Graham died July 11, Trump angled to play a role in picking his successor.

Trump threatens to rename Lake Ontario amid trade war

KEITO NEWMAN/THE CANADIAN PRESS VIA ASSOCIATED PRESS

People looked out across Lake Ontario and the Toronto Skyline from Toronto Harbor.

WASHINGTON — President Trump on Tuesday threatened to rename Lake Ontario as Lake America, the latest in a stream of provocations he has hurled at Canada and its leaders as a trade war heats up.

“The United States is giving serious consideration to changing the name of Lake Ontario to Lake America,” Trump wrote in a social media post, rationalizing the change because “we don’t expect to be doing much business with Ontario any longer.”

The president’s post was his latest verbal attack on Canada as the two countries exchange increasingly punitive threats over taxes on trade.

Trump also has taken aim at Ontario Premier Doug Ford, who had been one of the driving forces behind Canada’s opposition to the deal the US had proposed. In an earlier social media post Monday, Trump said that Ford was “overall unimpressive” and warned that “someone should get these clowns to ‘fall in line’ or, the consequences for Canada will be far WORSE!”

To drive his point home, Trump also posted a marked-up map of the lake, the smallest of the five Great Lakes and which separates the Canadian province of the same name and New York state. A big, red X crossed out the words “Lake Ontario” and, in an oversize gold font, “Lake America” replaced them, flanked by an American flag.

Historical references to Lake Ontario predate the founding of either the United States or Canada. The name is thought to be derived from an Indigenous term meaning either “beautiful water” or “great lake.”

Aiming to uncover secrets of tick-borne syndrome an alarming rise in tick-borne illnesses. While the actual number of cases in the United States isn’t known, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention estimates that as many as 450,000 people may be affected.

On Martha’s Vineyard, cases have been on the rise in recent years, said Claire Seguin, president and chief operating officer of Martha’s Vineyard Hospital.

In 2021, the hospital ran about 80 tests for alpha gal, according to data provided by Seguin. Last year, the number topped 1,600 and about 44 percent were positive. As of July 31, the hospital had administered more than 950 tests, nearly 60 percent of which were positive. A positive test does not necessarily mean the person has or will develop the symptoms of alpha-gal syndrome, Seguin noted.

“Last summer into October, we did a community health needs assessment and partnered with other groups across the island involved in health care,” Seguin told the Globe. “For the first time in a while, it really emerged that alpha-gal syndrome and the lone star tick problem was something that people were really worried about.”

Alpha gal, the sugar molecule, is found in the meat of most mammals, but notably not in humans or other primates. The molecule also exists in the saliva of certain ticks, such as the lone star tick.

In some people, exposure to the saliva through a bite can trigger an immune response that causes allergic reactions to red meat or, in some cases, dairy and certain medications that also contain the molecule. Unlike many other food allergies, reactions usually happen two to six hours after eating. Symptoms can include hives, nausea or vomiting, diarrhea, and, in more severe cases, anaphylaxis. At least one death has been linked to the syndrome.

The best way to avoid the allergy is to not get bitten, according to the CDC.

FINN GOMEZ FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE/FILE

A white spot is one of the signs of the lone star tick, which is connected to alpha-gal syndrome.

Experts are hopeful the new study on Martha’s Vineyard will provide critical answers to questions about the syndrome that could not only improve understanding of the allergy, but also might lead to treatments and preventive therapies. The research is largely being supported by philanthropic funding, Seguin said.

The new research follows several moves by Massachusetts least three months each year, including people who are pregnant. To qualify for the study, people need to have been bitten by a lone star tick within seven days and cannot have another primary food allergy or be on chronic high-dose steroids.

Participants will complete an initial visit followed by periodic check-ins.

“We follow them through the natural progression of the illness over the course of two years with a series of blood tests and symptoms tracking and interviews that give us the information about how they’re feeling at a given time,” Seguin said. “That’s never been done before and we hope that’ll help us glean how does this really work”

By better understanding the syndrome, Seguin said, it might be possible to figure out if people with the condition could be reintroduced to eating red meat. Perhaps, she said, the work could help lead to the development of a vaccine.

As the research gets underway, the island’s health officials are working to provide care and tackle cases, Seguin said.

“We’re all on the same page right now, which is great, and that’s giving momentum,” she said. “That makes me feel optimistic that we’re all going to work together to make things better.”

A quarter of ex-NFL players’ deaths tied to CTE, experts warn person NFL team, at least 13 players could develop CTE.

“To see that, at a minimum, 25 percent of NFL players have this pathology in their brain when they die, that means that we need to move towards how to treat this disease and how to cure it for these individuals,” said Daneshvar, who has treated ex-NFL players with dementia.

In 2017, researchers said they found CTE in 110 of the first 111 brains of former NFL players that had been donated for research at that point. The new study allows researchers to estimate how many CTE cases could be expected among all NFL players, not just those whose brains were donated to science.

In an email to members Tuesday, the NFL Players’ Association called the study both a “sobering reminder” of how CTE can affect lives, and a “call to action across the entire football ecosystem.”

“We all share a responsibility to advance research, improve access to care, develop better treatments, and support those affected by the long-term impacts of the game,” the association said in its email, according to Pro Football Talk.

The NFL mandates all players except quarterbacks, kickers, and punters wear padded protective covers over their helmets, known as Guardian caps, during contact practices, unless they wear one of 10 helmets deemed as high-performance models because they have padding and materials that are designed to better absorb and displace the force from hits.

DeMario Douglas, a Patriots wide receiver, told reporters Tuesday he doesn’t wear one, since he doesn’t get hit constantly like linemen, but he does protect his head with a newer helmet that has enhanced safety features.

“I had an older model, and I was feeling it when I hit the ground,” he said. “So then I switched to a newer model, and that felt way better and safer. Way better.”

Patriots offensive lineman Greg Van Roten said the safety caps and newer helmets have made a difference.

“As someone that’s been in the league for a long time and been through many iterations of different helmets, I can say that the newest helmets definitely feel the safest,” Van Roten said, adding: “I like the new helmets, and then the Guardian caps is just an added layer of protection on top of that.”

The stories of football players suffering in their retirement years are legion. The 2001 Patriots had seven former players die between the ages of 35 and 50.

In 2012, former Patriots linebacker Junior Seau fatally shot himself in the chest, which he disclosed was to preserve his brain for research. He was found to have Stage 2 CTE. Former Patriots tight end Aaron Hernandez, who died by suicide in 2017 while serving a life sentence for murder, was found to have the most advanced CTE case (Stage 3) for someone his age (27).

The NFL began removing players with suspected head trauma from games in 2009, four years after Dr. Bennet Omalu published a paper identifying CTE in the brain of former Pittsburgh Steelers center Mike Webster, whose autopsy he performed in 2002. The NFL initially denied — and tried to discredit — Omalu’s research, which became the subject of the 2015 movie “Concussion,” starring Will Smith. In 2009, a spokesperson for the league acknowledged that concussions can lead to long-term problems.

Then, after some 5,000 former players filed a class-action suit in 2013, the NFL mandated independent “concussion spotters” on sidelines. The league settled the suit for $1 billion in 2015.

In a statement Tuesday, an NFL spokesperson emphasized the league’s commitment to supporting the physical and mental well-being of its players.

“The NFL continuously strives to make the game of football safer, including by implementing strategies to reduce concussions and head impacts,” the spokesperson said.

High school football programs take the risks of head trauma seriously, said Milton High head coach Steve Dembowski, the coaching representative for the Massachusetts Interscholastic Athletic Association’s football committee. Dembowski’s team is one of several in the area that limit contact during training.

“We don’t tackle ‘live’ [in practice] all year,” he said. Some teams, he added, use “thud” tackling — the drill stops after an initial collision, instead of players wrestling each other to the turf.

But on-the-ground reports at local practices reveal that guidelines are not always followed everywhere.

CTE is a progressive neurological disease likely caused by repeated head injuries, including concussions as well as smaller impacts. While the disease is most often associated with football players, other athletes who play contact sports, including hockey, rugby, and soccer players, are also at risk. CTE has also been found in the brains of people in the military.

Symptoms can include cognitive impairment, such as memory loss, as well as behavior and mood changes, which can be severe.

The disease can only be definitively diagnosed after death by analyzing brain tissue.

In the new study, Daneshvar and his team examined more than 1,700 NFL players, including those who played just a single game in the league, who died between 2008 and 2021. The researchers zeroed in on deaths that occurred in the latter six years when brain donations, often by family members of the player, were most frequent.

From 2016 to 2021, there were 878 former players who had died; 235 of those players had donated their brains and 215 were subsequently found to have CTE, according to results published in The BMJ, a peer-reviewed journal, which equates to a roughly 25 percent ratio among the deceased players.

However, the researchers noted the actual rate of CTE among former players is likely higher since there were probably cases of the disease in the 643 athletes whose brains weren’t donated.

The study also found that about 60 percent of people with CTE had dementia and exhibited severe signs of impairment, including not being able to feed or groom themselves.

The main driver of risk for CTE is the cumulative effect of hundreds, if not thousands, of hits — big and small — over years of playing, Daneshvar said.

Youth, high school, and collegiate football programs should follow NFL protocols on full-contact practices, which limits them to once a week, said Daneshvar, whose own son plans to play flag football this fall.

“If we did that at all of those other levels of play, we would reduce the number of head impacts by well over 60 percent and that would result in substantially reduced rates of neurodegenerative diseases later in life,” he said.

At all levels of the game, some players are also turning to newer equipment technology, such as the padded safety caps that go over helmets and are designed to absorb impact.

Erin Hanson, chief executive of Guardian Sports, maker of the safety caps, said the latest study reinforces the understanding that players must reduce the impacts of all head injuries, not just concussions, they might experience over the course of their careers.

But equipment, Hanson said, is “one piece, and it is not the largest one.”

“No helmet or piece of equipment prevents or treats CTE, and we have never claimed one does,” Hanson said.

Starting in 2024, players had the option to wear them in games, but few do. Two Patriots — offensive lineman Jared Wilson and wide receiver Romeo Doubs — are among them.

“You can get ankle replacements, shoulder replacements, knee replacements,” Wilson told the Globe in February, adding: “You can’t replace your brain.”

Two contrasting takes on Moulton, Markey, and trans rights

Markey was wrong to apply broad Trump brush to his opponent

While I had already decided to vote for Representative Seth Moulton in the upcoming Democratic primary for US Senate, the Globe's thoughtful and compelling endorsement crystalized and reinforced my belief that Moulton is the right person for the perilous moment this country faces ("Seth Moulton for Senate," Editorial, Aug. 19). I appreciated that the endorsement of Moulton was done without diminishing Senator Ed Markey and all that he has accomplished in his long career. However, I also appreciated the Globe calling out Markey and his supporters for insinuating that Moulton was "allied with the Trump agenda on trans rights."

Moulton has been a staunch advocate for the LGBTQ community.

Given that Moulton has been a staunch advocate for the LGBTQ community, the Globe's characterization of his opponent's criticism as "cartoonishly unfair" is hardly hyperbole and needed to be said.

JIM CAIN

How can Moulton expect trans community to trust him?

I founded the Christopher Street Project, a national transgender advocacy organization. We fight to defend our community every single day, not only when it's easy. The Globe editorial board's decision to dismiss Representative Seth Moulton's 2024 comments about transgender children as merely "ham-fisted" brushes aside a critical question for Democratic voters, especially those with trans kids: Who will stand up for trans people's rights when it matters? Massachusetts was the first state in the nation to legalize gay marriage. Its political leaders must never treat LGBTQ rights as negotiable when doing so is politically convenient.

Voters know where Senator Ed Markey stands.

As your editorial says, Moulton "expressed some regret" recently for what he said two years ago. But which position of Moulton's should voters believe? Consistency matters. Voters know where Senator Ed Markey stands. He coauthored the Transgender Bill of Rights and has defended our freedoms at every turn. The Globe says that Markey's suggestion "that Moulton is somehow allied with the Trump agenda on trans rights is cartoonishly unfair." I think voters in a Democratic primary election will call concerns over Moulton's past remarks a fair question as it pertains to the candidate's judgment.

Nod to Roath over Lynch in 8th District debated

Ageism rears its head in knock on incumbent Lynch

"Lynch's experience and knowledge of the district make him the better choice." "Stephen Lynch, and his independent streak, deserve another term." These are words of the Globe editorial board, taken from past endorsements. In its Aug. 23 endorsement of Patrick Roath in the Eighth Congressional District, the board made a point of quoting Roath's statement that Lynch is merely a "backbencher." What the editorial did not mention was how the term "backbencher" is recycled rhetoric from Robbie Goldstein's 2020 campaign against Lynch. The editorial also suggested that since the average age in the district is 39.6 years old, and Roath is 39, the "demographics" are a good reason to vote for Lynch's challenger. Might I remind you that this is a primary election for a congressional seat, not a junior high school election for student council. The Globe has always fought against isms, but given this endorsement and your nod to Representative Seth Moulton over Senator Ed Markey in the Democratic Senate primary, it seems ageism is fair game.

Lynch ran out of gas years ago

The Globe editorial board has done the right thing by endorsing Patrick Roath over longtime incumbent Stephen Lynch in the Eighth Congressional District. Lynch ran out of gas years ago. It seems the only time constituents hear from him is every two years, when he runs again. No wonder we've received mailings from the hybrid political action committee Leaders We Deserve featuring a black-and-white image of Lynch that makes him look like a sad ghost.

Analyzing the state of calm that some saw in Lindsay Clancy

In reporting on the Lindsay Clancy trial, I'm surprised not to see a deeper discussion of the state of calm that some had observed in her. Suicidal patients, once they decide to carry out a plan, often feel calm and relieved. In clinical psychology this phenomenon is referred to as "sudden calm" or "unexpected calmness," and it has been found to precede suicide. This may apply to the observation that Clancy seemed to have "one of her best days" before the tragedy for which she is being tried.

Tram Nguyen

ENDORSEMENT

Tram Nguyen for Congress

State Representative Tram Nguyen's family arrived as political refugees in the United States from Vietnam when she was 5, carrying $100. She spoke no English. They lived in public housing while her dad delivered pizza and Chinese food to support the family.

"I knew what job he was at based on the smell on his clothes," she told the Globe editorial board recently.

Nguyen tells her family's story to explain why she is seeking to achieve a milestone: In November, she hopes to become the first Asian American elected to Congress from Massachusetts.

"I saw how much my parents struggled to provide for us," she said. "That was what prompted me to go into public service, to make sure that we are protecting the rights of those who, frankly, don't have a voice, don't feel empowered to use their voice."

At a time when refugees and immigrants are routinely vilified, and when the Democratic Party's relationship with the working class seems especially tenuous, electing Nguyen to Congress would send a powerful message — and send a powerful voice to Washington for the Sixth District. The Globe editorial board proudly endorses Nguyen in the Sept. 1 primary for the district that includes communities north and east of Boston.

After graduating from Tufts and Northeastern Law School, Nguyen first became a legal services lawyer representing victims of domestic violence. Then, in 2018, she beat an incumbent Republican to become a member of the state Legislature for Andover and nearby communities, a purple district.

On Beacon Hill, she impressed her constituents and fellow lawmakers. "Nobody works harder," said state Representative Dawne Shand of Newburyport, who described Nguyen as a mentor.

In her time in the Legislature, Nguyen has also shown that she's a good legislator. Whether on Beacon Hill or Capitol Hill, that's a job that calls for a particular skill set: building coalitions, cultivating allies, and understanding how to translate one's values into the nuts and bolts of legislation.

Colleagues point to one law Nguyen championed that they said showcases her abilities.

She shepherded legislation in the State House that set a specific deadline of 90 days — later tightened to 45 — for authorities to make a decision on whether to certify crime victims as eligible for special visas.

People who aren't crime victims — or haven't spent as much time working with them as Nguyen has — may not understand the significance of that law. But since Nguyen worked with so many crime victims as a lawyer, "she's been in the trenches," said state Senator Lydia Edwards, who pushed the bill in the Senate; getting that certification can be a life-changing matter for some immigrants who could otherwise be deported, and without the deadline some DA's offices had let those applications languish.

Three years ago, Nguyen also sponsored a bill to add coercive control to the legal definition of domestic abuse, expanding the law's scope beyond violence. It was codified into law a year later, in 2024.

Meanwhile, she helped recruit and fund-raise for other candidates — including Edwards, who credited Nguyen with helping to organize the minuscule number of women of color in the Legislature.

Nguyen's best opponent is Dan Koh, the former chief of staff to former mayor Marty Walsh. Koh ran previously for Congress in 2018. He also worked in former president Joe Biden's White House and has Biden's endorsement.

Koh is highly knowledgeable about the issues and knows how to navigate official Washington. He's a prodigious fund-raiser and would also be the first Asian American elected from Massachusetts.

There is a difference, though, between understanding the issues and the executive branch and knowing how to make law, and Koh doesn't have Nguyen's record of legislative accomplishment.

And while there's every reason to believe Koh would be good at the constituent-service side of a representative's job, in Nguyen's case there's no doubt. She already has a record.

For instance, in North Andover, she won praise for helping the town's finances and for working with the Registry of Motor Vehicles to make its website easier for seniors to navigate. "She's returned a lot of money to the district, and that's made a lot of difference for the town and the senior center," said Luke Michel, a local political activist who has endorsed Nguyen's campaign.

The seat, which opened up when Representative Seth Moulton decided to run for Senate, includes roughly 785,000 people across 39 cities and towns. The Sixth District stretches from historic port cities like Gloucester and Newburyport to blue-collar Lynn — the district's largest city at just over 100,000 people — and Peabody, up through affluent suburbs like Andover, Marblehead, and Manchester-by-the-Sea.

It's wealthier, whiter, older, and more educated than the state and country as a whole. Still, it's not monolithic — the district holds economic and ethnic diversity, from Salem and Lynn's immigrant and Latino populations to the North Shore's fishing towns.

Unlike in some other Democratic primaries pitting progressives against centrists, the race in the Sixth District does not break down along clear ideological lines. Nguyen has been endorsed by progressive groups and politicians, like Representative Ayanna Pressley, but also by more moderate politicians like Massachusetts House Speaker Ronald Mariano.

Democratic primary voters in the Sixth have good choices on Sept. 1. But in our view, Nguyen offers the best mix of proven record and future potential.

The MAGA minions protect the ‘Epstein class’

At a President Trump campaign rally on Friday, a man in the audience wore a black T-shirt with these words printed in white: “KILL YOUR LOCAL PEDOPHILE.”

There was a time when such a message in MAGA world would have garnered cheers among those who’ve spent much of the past decade on a crusade to root out those they’ve accused of being pedophiles and child sex traffickers.

But that’s not what happened while Trump was stumping for Republican Senator Darline Graham of South Carolina.

The man in the provocative T-shirt was loudly jeered and some attendees flipped obscene gestures at him. When security walked the man out of the Myrtle Beach Convention

It was never about protecting children. It was only about smearing high-profile Democrats.

Center, the crowd roared and Trump mocked him.

Looks like the MAGA faithful don’t have a problem with the “Epstein class” anymore.

Up until his arrest on sex trafficking charges and his death in a New York jail cell in 2019, Jeffrey Epstein, a convicted sex offender, amassed a collection of powerful friends including former prince Andrew, Bill Clinton, Bill Gates, Elon Musk, and Trump.

Except for the many Epstein survivors and their allies who demanded justice, few were as ardent about keeping Epstein’s name and crimes as prominent as Trump’s MAGA minions. Some, like FBI Director Kash Patel and Dan Bongino, the former deputy FBI director, even landed in Trump’s second administration.

Not long after her confirmation in 2025, Pam Bondi, the former attorney general, told Fox News that she had Epstein’s client list “sitting on my desk.” Months later, her Justice Department claimed that no such list existed.

Trump continually suggests the Epstein files are a “Democratic hoax,” even as some Republican House representatives, including Thomas Massie of Kentucky and Marjorie Taylor Greene of Georgia, pushed for full disclosure. The price for what Trump saw as their disloyalty was their congressional careers. Greene resigned, and Massie lost his primary to a Trump-endorsed opponent.

Last November, Congress overwhelmingly passed the Epstein Files Transparency Act to compel the DOJ to release the complete dossier, and Trump signed it into law. But the department slow-walked the release and millions of files still remain unavailable. And those made public largely redacted the names of alleged perpetrators while leaving victims’ names exposed.

According to a New York Times analysis, Trump’s name and related references appear more than 38,000 times in the released files, including “salacious and unverified claims.”

Like Trump, his followers know that the Epstein files and what they may reveal are not a hoax. It’s probable that some of the same people who pushed wild conspiracies like “Pizzagate,” which compelled an armed man to go to a Washington, D.C., pizza restaurant in 2016 because internet-fueled nonsense claimed that prominent Democrats held child sex slaves there, have turned away from an actual pedophile scandal.

What MAGA has shown is that their interest in the Epstein files only went as far as how many Democrats it might expose as child sexual predators. Once it was Trump’s name appearing again and again — and, to be clear, the president has not been charged with any wrongdoing — they lost interest.

That’s because it was never about protecting children. It was only about smearing high-profile Democrats.

It’s hard to imagine that the Epstein files, a decades-long story of how immense wealth and access helped to mask heinous crimes and countless victims, has mostly disappeared in the media. Obviously, there’s a lot going on: Trump’s humiliating quagmire in Iran; his ongoing efforts to sabotage voting in the midterm elections; his reckless destruction of D.C.’s iconic landscape; and grocery and gas prices that seem to defy gravity.

But silence about Epstein punishes survivors and protects the guilty. So far, not a single person has been arrested or charged since the partial release of the files. And given his past comments and behavior, it seems unlikely that Attorney General Todd Blanche will release or unredact additional files despite a court order to do so.

The Trump administration may believe it has created enough distractions and delays to divert public attention from possible evidence of Epstein’s crimes and those who could be implicated. That’s why it matters when someone shouts “pedophile protector” in Trump’s presence, which also happened in South Carolina and when Trump visited a Michigan auto plant in January, or wears a damning T-shirt.

It’s a crucial reminder to this president and those who support him that not everyone has turned their backs on the Epstein survivors and that all they endured still demands accountability.

MARK GODFREY/AP

A GI with the US 25th Division read Stars and Stripes newspaper at Cu Chi, South Vietnam, on Sept. 10, 1969.

Trump’s war on the press comes for Stars and Stripes

By Jill Abramson

Jill Abramson, a former executive editor of The New York Times, teaches journalism at Northeastern University and is a contributing Globe Opinion writer.

Donald Trump has hacked away at the First Amendment since the day he entered the White House, but his latest attack on press freedom may be the most disgraceful.

The Pentagon has fired the editor at Stars and Stripes, the respected military newspaper that has provided authoritative news to soldiers on the front lines and their families since the Civil War. The Pentagon also dismissed a reporter and the publisher, who had just announced his retirement.

Although the Pentagon provides some of the newspaper’s funding, a congressional regulation, until this year, had protected the paper from meddling by military brass. It had an ombudsman to help police its independence. No more. The regulation was rescinded; the ombudsman fired.

Stars and Stripes has given family members of those on active duty a steady stream of important information, from where to find health care to the conditions under which their loved ones are serving.

Trump had been gunning for Stars and Stripes since he tried to get Congress to defund it at the end of his first term. Under pressure from Republican lawmakers, he backed down.

The alleged cause of last week’s firings is “insubordination,” according to the Pentagon. Earlier this month, Stars and Stripes published a blockbuster story about woeful conditions aboard the Navy aircraft carrier USS Abraham Lincoln, where 5,000 service members had spent more than 250 days at sea in the Middle East as part of the war in Iran. The story documented severe mental health problems on the ship, including suicidal ideation and an attempt by one crew member to jump overboard. Previously, Stars and Stripes had reported on food and water shortages.

The story about the conditions was picked up widely by other news organizations. (The aircraft carrier left the Mideast on Aug. 21 for its home port in San Diego, just 10 days after the critical story was published.)

Trump and Defense Secretary Pete Hegseth denied that there were hazardous conditions. Unsurprisingly, Trump called the stories “fake news” and absurdly told reporters that the deployment of the carrier was “not nearly long enough.” Hegseth said the reports “misrepresented” conditions on the boat.

The basis for the accusation of insubordination against the top Stars and Stripes journalists was an interview they gave to CBS News after the USS Lincoln story was published. This was the coup de grace because they publicly criticized the Pentagon, which is trying to force journalists to give it positive coverage and restricting press access to the building.

But the Iran war, which has dragged on since February, defies positive coverage given all the strategic mistakes the Trump administration has made and its false promises that the war would be over quickly. The need to give the public the truth that the war the United States started with Israel is going badly demonstrates why the First Amendment is first.

We are now living under outright censorship by the Trump administration, which has expunged important reports about the environment, science, and health from government websites. Last week it threatened to sue the nonprofit Center for American Progress if it published a report that showed that National Guard agents on city streets did not make crime go down.

While shocking, we should have expected this. Shortly before the war began, Pentagon spokesman Sean Parnell ordered a change in Stars and Stripes content, eliminating what he described as “woke distractions” and refocusing its coverage to military readiness and warfighting. News reports on the realities of a misguided war are hardly “woke.”

Stars and Stripes has a specialized audience and an illustrious history that matters. Through two world wars it published work of wartime journalists, including Ernie Pyle and Andy Rooney.

It made a star out of a young Marilyn Monroe by featuring her publicity stills and pin-ups. After Stars and Stripes crowned her “Miss Cheesecake 1952,” she was soon entertaining the troops in South Korea.

The paper won a George Polk award in 2010 and the Columbia Journalism Review awarded it a laurel for the report on the USS Abraham Lincoln.

With so many scandals and controversies, the outrages of this administration are often too quickly forgotten and tend to blend into one another.

This story demands our attention.

Clancy case should force us to ask: Who cares for new mothers?

By Tina Cassidy

Tina Cassidy is the author of “Birth: The Surprising History of How We Are Born.”

While jurors decide the fate of Lindsay Clancy, a Duxbury mother who allegedly murdered her three young children and tried to kill herself during a severe bout of postpartum psychosis, there is another culprit not on trial that should be: how little support moms have with their newborn.

Historically, in almost every culture in the world, the postpartum period was a time swaddled in elaborate customs, with women swooping in to protect new mothers and babies. Mayan mothers would not resume their duties for 20 days; Japanese mothers stayed in their birth chamber for three weeks; in many European countries, mothers were not allowed to cook for 40 days after giving birth and their “Godsibbs” or sisters in God — this is where we get the term “gossip” — fed her special meals outside the company of men.

These instinctive early detection and intervention customs, which every time period and culture put their own stamp on, not only allowed mothers to rest and recuperate, preventing a tragic spiral, but also ensured that those around her would notice any troubling physical or mental maladies and be able to step in. These high-touch rites have largely disappeared in modern times, a trend that accelerated after World War II, when most developed countries moved birth from the home to the hospital.

The isolation women experience after giving birth is exacerbated by America’s culture of rugged individualism and the expectation that we should be hunkered down, alone in our nuclear family. Many mothers who had babies during the COVID-19 pandemic years, as Clancy did, had it even worse: mandates kept them from being with loved ones or visitors, even in hospitals.

It’s hard enough to get through the postpartum months without enough support, but there is also pressure to do it well and fast. Mothers feel pressure to sleep-train the baby, stay on top of the laundry, and snap back to a pre-baby body. One-third of all births in the United States are by cesarean section, which requires at least six weeks recovery. About half of the workforce is women, so many mothers are balancing all of this while preparing to return to the workplace, which has its own expectations. Lack of paid parental leave often forces a quick return, regardless of whether they are mentally or physically ready.

Clancy wrote in her diary that she was “drowning,” a common feeling for anyone trying to get through the “fourth trimester” without enough support. Today, if women need postpartum help, they often have to pay for it — assuming they can afford it — whether that is a night nurse, a nanny, a lactation consultant, or a subscription app to track sleeping and feeding. These services are part of a blossoming industry with a market size of nearly $17 billion, expected to reach more than $27 billion in the next five years — proof that the need is there.

And yet, these interventions can’t fix everything for everyone.

Nature’s cocktail of oxytocin, progesterone, and endorphins are supposed to help a mom love, nurture, and breastfeed her newborn, though profound shifts about a day after delivery can work against some mothers. Progesterone and estrogen, which helped sustain the pregnancy, plummet to levels not experienced before conception, causing weepiness, irritability, and mood swings for at least a couple of weeks postpartum. Ten to 20 percent of the time, this rapid hormonal change can develop into postpartum depression, with the mother showing little interest in the newborn, or neglecting their own daily routines such as eating or sleeping. For an even smaller group — about one or two births out of a thousand — it may develop into postpartum psychosis, a diagnosis that only came into focus in the 1960s, when society became more willing to talk about mental illness.

Over the past 25 years, high-profile cases have evolved the way society perceives, treats, and prosecutes postpartum cases. Before the Clancy trial, the most famous case was that of Andrea Yates, a Texas woman who, in 2001, drowned her five children in a bathtub. Prosecutors successfully claimed that having postpartum psychosis was no excuse for murder, because Yates could distinguish right from wrong. Five years later, a new trial found her not guilty by reason of insanity.

While the Clancy trial continues, there is much to interrogate outside of the courtroom. Systemically, we need to fix health care and expand access to paid parental leave (for dads, too) and make child care affordable. But there’s also plenty we can do as individuals. Why do we as a culture put more effort into gender reveals and baby showers than showing up for postpartum moms? What if the best gift we could give after the birth of a child is our time and undivided attention? Checking in not just with a text, but a visit, sitting with her, letting her vent, or sleep, folding laundry, changing a diaper, whether or not mom asks for help.

Clancy did have some help — from her out-of-state family and a nanny who worked three days a week for a few months.

But as ancient wisdom could have told us, it would not be enough.

A dazzling star who always got the last laugh

Her songs spoke to millions, confronting privation and loss even as they radiated possibility and hope.

She was, quintessentially, a uniter of people. In 2019, The New York Times ran a story with the headline “Is There Anything We Can All Agree On? Yes: Dolly Parton.”

Ms. Parton cannily exploited — and transcended — rural stereotypes and kitsch to fashion a down-home chic entirely her own. (“A country girl’s idea of glam,” she called it in the song “Backwoods Barbie.”) In the process, she became an international celebrity who headlined stadium tours, starred in Hollywood movies, built a business empire, and appeared on the cover of Rolling Stone. Her at times girlish soprano notwithstanding, she was anything but the “dumb blonde” invoked in the title of her 1966 single.

“I’ve created this and played it up — the makeup, the whole persona,” Ms. Parton said, alluding to her plastic surgeries as well as her colloquial “Dollyisms” in a 2002 interview with the Times.

“But this isn’t all I am,” she added. “It’s not even most of what I am. Hopefully people can see beneath the hair to know there’s a brain, beneath the boobs to know there’s a heart, and behind all the other stuff to know there’s some talent.”

Inducted into both the country music and rock ‘n’ roll halls of fame, Ms. Parton was the top-ranking female singer on country radio from 1967 to 1993, and had a total of 25 number one country singles.

Her early breakthrough came in 1967 when she was hired as the “girl singer” on “The Porter Wagoner Show,” a syndicated country music television variety program. Several years later, she had number one country hits with records including “Jolene” and “I Will Always Love You.”

Both songs were among about 3,000 titles she published in her lifetime, hundreds of which have been recorded by other artists, including Tina Turner, Norah Jones, the White Stripes, Merle Haggard, RuPaul, and Whitney Houston.

Featured in the 1992 movie “The Bodyguard,” Houston’s version of “I Will Always Love You” spent 14 weeks at the top of the pop chart. The song had previously been a number one country single twice, in versions released by Ms. Parton in 1974 and 1982.

With Loretta Lynn and Tammy Wynette, Ms. Parton blazed a trail for women in country music, inspiring such contemporaries as Linda Ronstadt and Emmylou Harris, as well as latter-day hitmakers including Carrie Underwood, Kacey Musgraves, and Taylor Swift. She recorded a pair of albums, “Trio” and “Trio II,” with Ronstadt and Harris.

Stylistically, Ms. Parton’s music ran the gamut: mountain bluegrass and soul-inflected countrypolitan, disco-era pop and covers of classic rock touchstones written by Neil Young and Led Zeppelin — all of it rendered indelible by her irrepressible spirit and alternately keening and gossamer soprano drawl.

She wrote unabashedly, in simple Southern vernacular, about growing up as the daughter of an illiterate sharecropper.

maybe her most beloved original, Ms. Parton plumbed childhood feelings of pride and humiliation. In this case, the coat in question — quilted from rags and originally a source of delight and the expression of a mother’s love — becomes an object of ridicule when Dolly’s classmates poke fun at her for wearing it to school.

So with patches on my britches

*And holes in both my shoes,
In my coat of many colors
I hurried off to school
Just to find the others laugh-* *ing

And making fun of me
In my coat of many colors
My Mama made for me*

“That little song is like a world of things,” Ms. Parton said of “Coat of Many Colors” in “Dolly Parton, Songteller: My Life in Lyrics” (2020), written with Robert K. Oermann. “It teaches about bullying, about love, about acceptance, about good parents. That little story has even been written into a schoolbook to teach children about being different.”

Empathy was a hallmark of Ms. Parton’s songwriting, perhaps nowhere so much as in “Down From Dover” and “Daddy Come Get Me,” harrowing Southern gothic ballads about teen pregnancy and how patriarchy blames and victimizes young women.

Assertive women populated Ms. Parton’s songs, whether through her protofeminist rewrite of Jimmie Rodgers’s “Mule Skinner Blues (Blue Yodel No. 8)” or by advocating parity in the bedroom (“Touch Your Woman”) and in the workplace (“9 to 5”).

“It’s a rich man’s game/No matter what they call it/And you spend your life/Putting money in his wallet,” Ms. Parton sang, with a mixture of fury and resolve, in the 1980 pink-collar comedy “9 to 5.” Besides writing and performing the movie’s theme song, a number one pop and country hit, she also starred in the film as a beleaguered secretary drudging for a sexist boss, alongside Jane Fonda and Lily Tomlin.

Ms. Parton would go on to star in other films, among them “The Best Little Whorehouse in Texas” (1982), with Burt Reynolds; “Steel Magnolias” (1989), with Julia Roberts and Shirley MacLaine; and “Straight Talk” (1992), with James Woods.

In 1976, she became the first woman in country music to host her own syndicated TV series; a decade later, she had an hour-long variety show on ABC. But for all her reach and command as an entertainer — including her ubiquitous appearances on TV talk shows and specials — Ms. Parton viewed herself, first and foremost, as a songwriter.

Dolly Rebecca Parton was born on Jan. 19, 1946, the fourth of 12 children of Robert Lee and Avie Lee (Owens) Parton, in a one-room cabin on the banks of the Little Pigeon River in Sevier County, Tennessee. Her father was a tenant farmer, and her mother was a homemaker who sang old Anglo-Celtic ballads and hymns while doing housework.

The Partons were so poor that Dolly’s father had to pay the doctor who attended her birth with a sack of cornmeal. Ms. Parton may have grown up without plumbing, heat, electricity, and other modern conveniences, but she always insisted that she also grew up happy, and that music offered her a refuge from want.

When she was 5 or so, she wrote her first song, a ditty about a corncob doll with corn-silk hair called “Little Tiny Tasseltop.” She started singing on radio and on TV at 10, on the “Cas Walker Farm and Home Hour” in Knoxville, Tenn., securing bookings with the help of her uncle Bill Owens, who also bought her her first guitar. The two would go on to write many songs together.

Ms. Parton made her recording debut in 1959, the same year she made her first appearance at the Grand Ole Opry. In 1962, she signed a songwriting deal with Tree International Publishing (now part of Sony Music Publishing). Two years later, she became the first person in her family to graduate from high school.

In 1966, Ms. Parton married Carl Dean, an asphalt contractor who shunned the limelight. The couple had met two years earlier, at a laundromat in Nashville, when Ms. Parton was 18. Dean died in 2025.

Ms. Parton leaves six of her siblings: Willadeene Parton, Robert Lee Parton Jr., Stella Parton, Cassie Parton, Freida Parton, and Rachel Ann Parton George.

In 1965, Ms. Parton signed a recording contract with Monument Records, not long before she and her uncle wrote two Top 10 country songs for singer Bill Phillips. She released the first of her roughly 90 Top 40 country hits — “Dumb Blonde,” a plucky denunciation of female stereotypes — in 1966.

In 1967, she began her seven-year tenure with “The Porter Wagoner Show.” She and Wagoner would go on to release 21 hit duets together, including “Holding On to Nothin’” (1968) and “Just Someone I Used to Know” (1969).

But with the arrival of the 1970s — and in no small part because of the national exposure she received on Wagoner’s show — Ms. Parton started to eclipse her employer in popularity.

The tension that resulted was further aggravated when she began steadily producing No. 1 country singles such as “Joshua” and “Jolene.” Ms. Parton parted ways with Wagoner in 1974 to concentrate on her solo career, but not before writing “I Will Always Love You” as an expression of gratitude and farewell.

The separation initially proved difficult for Parton, both emotionally and financially, but it also opened doors to new opportunities like the chance to host her own TV show. She was named female artist of the year by the Country Music Association in each of the two years (1975 and 1976) after her break with Wagoner.

Embracing a more pop approach than she had earlier in her career, Ms. Parton continued her ascendance on the charts in the late ’70s with blockbuster hits including “Here You Come Again” and “Heartbreaker.” Both were number one country singles that crossed over to the pop Top 40. The Country Music Association awarded her its top honor, entertainer of the year, in 1978.

After her 1980 recording of “9 to 5” earned her two Grammy Awards and an Oscar nomination, Ms. Parton turned her attention to movies, TV appearances, and the development, in the mid-1980s, of Dollywood, her Smoky Mountain theme park, among other business ventures.

In 1987, she released the first of her two albums with Ronstadt and Harris, the platinum-selling “Trio.” She hosted “Saturday Night Live” in 1989 and teamed up with Lynn and Wynette to record the album “Honky Tonk Angels” in 1993.

She published her memoir, “Dolly: My Life and Other Unfinished Business,” a New York Times bestseller, in 1994. The next year, she established the Imagination Library, a philanthropic endeavor through which more than 200 million books have been distributed to babies and young children.

Endowed with a surfeit of creativity and an unflagging work ethic, Ms. Parton admitted in interviews to sleeping as few as three hours a night. She was nominated for more than 50 Grammy Awards, 10 of which she won, along with being recognized for lifetime achievement by the Recording Academy in 2011.

Ms. Parton was inducted into the Country Music Hall of Fame in 1999 and the Songwriters Hall of Fame in 2001, and was awarded the National Medal of Arts in 2005. In 2022, she was inducted into the Rock & Roll Hall of Fame.

But perhaps even more remarkable than the profusion of accolades and awards was Ms. Parton’s unstinting generosity of spirit — her commitment, born of deep religious convictions and an immense heart, to seeing the humanity in all people.

Ms. Parton not only sang the traditional Southern gospel music her mother taught her; she also wrote and sang “Travelin’ Thru,” an Oscar-nominated song from “Transamerica,” the 2005 movie about a transgender woman seeking to connect with her son. In 2017, Ms. Parton collaborated with Miley Cyrus, her goddaughter, to record “Rain-bowland,” a tribute to gay pride and liberation.

Time and again in her career, Ms. Parton reflected on her impoverished upbringing and how she followed her dreams to escape it. “I wanted to be free,” she told Rolling Stone in 1977. “I had my songs to sing, I had an ambition, and it burned inside me.”

She added: “It was something I knew would take me out of the mountains. I knew I could see worlds beyond the Smoky Mountains.”

We will always love her, an icon forever in charge through all the changes gernails.

The singer, songwriter, actress, and entrepreneur passed away Tuesday at 80. Her mass appeal across entertainment, merchandising, medicine, and human rights helped make her a beloved figure to millions. Like the butterfly, which she adapted as her trademark after her hit song “Love is Like a Butterfly,” she spread her sequined and diamond-encrusted wings and added a bit of sparkle to everything she did.

That sparkle extended to helping bridge our country’s current divide. At Dollywood, her theme park that recently entered its 40th year, everyone from church groups to gay men in feather boas comes together. Families of all types happily sink their teeth into thick loaves of fragrant cinnamon bread. Parton is the common thread that brings them all together peacefully and happily. It’s a microcosm of what the United States could be. A coat of many colors of humanity that exists peacefully alongside the roller coasters.

Her first hit, 1966’s “Dumb Blonde,” was her salvo against the sexism that would soon follow her throughout the next two decades. Even at this early stage in her prolific career, she was playing with her image, letting the world know that she was anything but a dumb blonde.

“Just because I’m blonde, don’t think I’m dumb,” she sang in a soprano trill, with a beehive teased to the heavens. “Cause this dumb blonde ain’t nobody’s fool.”

Parton, an immensely gifted singer-songwriter who went on to form a successful partnership with Porter Wagoner in the late 1960s and early 1970s, found that her music was not the topic of conversation when late-night hosts continually made off-color jokes about her bosom.

Her reaction to the barrage of breast jokes was to get in on the game: “When all else fails, I just do a boob joke.”

The jokes simply kept her name in the zeitgeist, created a brand, and then she made that brand her own. Her often-repeated line, “It takes a lot of money to look this cheap,” was a firm acknowledgment that she knew exactly what she was doing. She made as many jokes about herself as others. But even Parton had limits. Her 1978 interview with Barbara Walters was a master class in handling rude questions.

“All these years people have thought the joke was on me,” she told Walters, after Walters continually goaded Parton about her rural family and her figure.

“But actually it has been on the public. I know exactly what I’m doing. I can change it at any time. I make more jokes about myself than anybody.”

What was often lost amid the snickering was the acknowledgment of her massive hits such as “Jolene” and “I Will Always Love You,” which went on to become a million-seller for Whitney Houston.

She conquered both the pop and country charts with “Here You Come Again,” and just when we thought Parton couldn’t show us more, she morphed into a movie star and held her own against Jane Fonda and Lilly Tomlin in “9 to 5.” She charmed her way through “Steel Magnolias” with Olympia Dukakis and Sally Field. She made us all wish that she was our sassy Appalachian cousin. Our personal backwoods Barbie.

There was public-facing Parton, who could drop witticisms faster than hits, and then the behind-the-scenes Parton, a philanthropist who donated millions to charitable causes. Her generosity made headlines when it was reported that she donated $1 million to Vanderbilt University Medical Center. Staff at the center still sing her praises.

Earlier this year, the East Tennessee Children’s Hospital in Knoxville officially rebranded as the Dolly Parton Children’s Hospital to honor Parton’s generational commitment to pediatric care. Her Imagination Library has gifted more than 300 million books to children from birth to age 5 who are enrolled in the program. They receive one free book per month. She created the program in honor of her father, who could not read or write, but she considered him the smartest man she knew.

A fierce entrepreneur, she put her stamp on everything, from wine to cake mixes to fashion. She even opened a truck stop. A hotel bearing her name will open in Nashville later this year. The amusement park was a venture that should have been a joke and a quick flop. Aside from lovely views of the Smoky Mountains, what could possibly bring tourists to East Tennessee?

As it turned out, Parton could. Crowds flood multiple gift shops at the park hoping to bring home a bit of Parton’s magic and shine. Parton told us 60 years ago that she was not a dumb blonde. It turns out, she was one of the smartest blondes in American culture.

BSO musicians secure key gains in new contract accord

By Malcolm Gay
GLOBE STAFF

Ending months of tense contract negotiations, musicians and management at the Boston Symphony Orchestra have agreed to a three-year collective bargaining agreement, the parties announced Tuesday.

The contract, which was negotiated amid deep divisions that emerged after the sudden dismissal of music director Andris Nelsons this spring, represents several big wins for musicians, including contractual language giving them greater say in artistic matters.

After marathon negotiations over the weekend, a 94 percent majority of musicians voted to ratify the new contract during a 24-hour voting period that ended Tuesday evening. The new agreement, effective through Aug. 26, 2029, provides wage hikes and enhanced pension benefits. It also gives musicians a critical role in the upcoming search for a new music director.

Management, however, maintained control over several key artistic areas, ensuring that ultimate decision-making authority remained with management and the board.

Tellingly, both parties, along with the Boston Musicians' Association, announced the new contract via a joint statement that sought to frame the agreement as a significant breakthrough in the effort to repair trust damaged by Nelsons' ouster.

"This agreement marks an important step toward a more collaborative future for the BSO," the parties said in the joint statement. "It creates a precedent-setting partnership between musicians and management in artistic planning and centers excellence across all the work we do on our stages and in our communities."

BSO president Chad Smith said he was grateful to the musicians for their partnership.

"I'm proud of the agreement we reached, which deepens our collaboration with the musicians and strengthens their role in the artistic planning process," Smith said in a statement. "This agreement marks an important milestone for the BSO and reflects our shared commitment to artistic excellence."

Todd Seeber, chair of the BSO Players Committee, said the new agreement kept them financially competitive with peer orchestras.

It "is also an innovative and transformative path forward for American

Errors force Vt. to remove hundreds from voter rolls

By Paul Heintz

MONTPELIER — Vermont election officials removed roughly 900 people from the state's voter rolls Monday after determining they had been inadvertently added due to an "administrative mistake."

Though many had been improperly registered to vote for a decade or so, none had cast ballots in that time, the officials said, so no elections were affected by the errors. It was unclear how many of the 900 would have been ineligible to vote due to their citizenship status or other reasons.

A bipartisan pair of elected leaders disclosed the news at a press conference Tuesday designed to instill confidence in the state's voting system even as they revealed the problem. Democratic Secretary of State Sarah Copeland Hanzas, who oversees Vermont elections, and Republican Governor Phil Scott lauded their cooperation and transparency, particularly as election administration has become a divisive national issue.

"Where else in the country in this day and age of so much polarization and partisanship" would such a pair "stand here side by side in front of a podium and talk about this issue to . . . admit to some of our shortcomings?" Scott asked. "Where would that happen other than here? So that should give trust, I believe, to Vermonters that we're dealing with this head on."

The development came as federal courts consider President Trump's efforts to restrict mail-in voting, which he has criticized without evidence as being rife with fraud. The Supreme Court declined to block those efforts in a procedural ruling

Attorney slams Vance's comments on Maine ICE shooting victim as 'disingenuous'

By Camilo Fonseca

An attorney representing the family of a Colombian immigrant fatally shot last month by an ICE agent in Biddeford, Maine, sharply criticized comments by Vice President JD Vance that tied the killing to immigration-related drug enforcement efforts.

Vance, at a visit Monday to a defense contractor in Brewer, Maine, appeared to suggest that the death of Johan Sebastián Durán Guerrero during a traffic stop on July 13 was part of the Trump administration's crackdown on the illicit fentanyl trade, which administration officials have linked to illegal immigration.

"When I look at the case, what I see is a country that's trying to enforce its laws, and it hasn't for a long time," Vance said, adding that Democrats are "far more worried about a shooting involving an illegal alien than they are about the fact that tens of thousands of Mainers died from fentanyl overdoses by that poison brought into our community."

"My message to Democrats who are so worried about that situation is to say, have a little bit of perspective," he continued.

But Benjamin Gideon, part of the legal team representing Durán Guerrero's partner and young daughter, pushed back Tuesday, saying "nobody — not DHS or ICE" has linked Durán Guerrero to the illicit drug trade.

Tompkins trial opens with dueling narratives

Defense dismissive of assertion of corruption

By Danny McDonald

An overt abuse of power? Or a legal overreach based on an unreliable witness?

The prosecution and defense teams Tuesday offered up dueling narratives during the opening statements in the federal corruption trial of Suffolk Sheriff Steven W. Tompkins, who is facing extortion charges.

Specifically, the US attorney's office alleges he used his position as sheriff to extort a cannabis company twice — once for early access to purchase $50,000 worth of stock in the company and later to get his money back after the stock value tanked.

"This case is about corruption at one of the highest levels of state government," federal prosecutor Dustin Chao told the jury Tuesday at John Joseph Moakley United States Courthouse in Boston's Seaport.

For Chao, the heart of the case was a web of power, greed, and relationships, specifically, the relationship between Tompkins and Frank Perullo, a cannabis executive and longtime Boston lobbyist who once worked as a campaign adviser for Tompkins.

Prosecutors allege that Tompkins forced Perullo, cofounder of Ascend Wellness Holdings, to sell him company stock for $50,000 before that venture went public, then demanded he be repaid after the value of his shares sank below his initial investment. Tompkins had not signed any agreement that would have guaranteed a refund on his initial investment, according to the indictment, but Perullo paid him back anyway.

"He wanted those shares and he was not going to take 'no' for an answer," said Chao of Tompkins on Tuesday. Chao implored the jury to listen to Perullo "carefully."

A man accused of speeding a boat through Boston Harbor while intoxicated and crashing into a pier at Logan International Airport, killing a 24-year-old Andover woman, has been indicted on involuntary manslaughter and other charges, prosecutors said Tuesday.

Lawrence Shieh, 40, of the Seaport, allegedly had a blood alcohol level of 0.20, more than twice the legal limit, after the May 13 crash that killed Elizabeth Dankert and seriously injured two of her friends, Suffolk District Attorney Kevin Hayden said at a news conference.

"In the end, we are here today, and Lizzie Dankert is not here today because of Lawrence Shieh's dangerous and ultimately deadly behavior," Hayden said. "He was intoxicated. He unlawfully took a boat out into Boston Harbor in the dead of night. He drove that boat at a reckless speed in a restricted area of the Boston Harbor."

Cellphone video from the boat showed Shieh "dancing and engaging with the three young women" and, about six seconds before

Man fatally shot by police had mental health issues, family says

By Spencer Buell
GLOBE STAFF

As an investigation into last week's fatal police shooting in Cambridge continues, family members are remembering William Woodworth, the 64-year-old Watertown man killed by officers in Central Square, as a handyman and artist who had mental health struggles dating back to childhood.

"I want people to know him how he was: A very lovely and loving person," said Felicity Woodworth, his wife, who said he was generous with his time and skilled with his hands.

Authorities have said officers fatally shot Woodworth just after 8 p.m. on a side street in Cambridge's Central Square after he pointed a gun at police. The incident is now the subject of an investigation led by the Middlesex district attorney's office that involves reviewing footage from police body-worn cameras that may have captured the events leading up to Woodworth's death.

His wife, who lives in Framingham, said she and Woodworth, whom friends and family called Bill, separated more than a decade ago but never divorced, and have remained friends.

She said she planned to meet with authorities on Wednesday and that she would ask to view any available video of the shooting. "I want to see what happened," she said.

Leslie Woodworth, one of his two sisters, remembered her brother as a complicated man who dealt with many troubles, physical and mental.

"He's a man who struggled with major mental illness for his entire life. I noticed it when he was 6 years old, and I was 12," she said. "He's been in the mental health system since he was [a] teenager ... I don't know what happened, that he ended up hanging with unsavory people, until he had that gun charge a couple years ago."

Court records show he was arrested in 2023 for alleged possession of a loaded unlicensed firearm. Police said they found the weapon in a car he was driving, but the charges were dropped because a judge found the search of the vehicle was conducted without a warrant.

His sister said he had told her he had several guns, which she said he carried out of a sense of "paranoia," and because he feared for his safety.

And, she said, he lived with pain and lingering medical problems from an injury in childhood and, later, in several vehicle crashes.

Woodworth said her brother had also been on a lifelong spiritual journey, read philosophy, and took an interest in Buddhism. As a younger man, he made large oil paintings of scenes, including one of snow-covered mountains and a Buddha resting under a tree. Some of them are still displayed in her office.

"This was a human being who had a life. It's very sad to see him go down this way," she said.

Woodworth's wife, for her part, said she is choosing to focus on the happy memories she has with her late husband, who she said was skilled with his hands and had several jobs over the years, working in kitchens, as a house painter, and as a taxi driver.

They took many trips together to antique stores and bed-and-breakfasts in New England, she said.

"He was very good to me. He really loved his family," she said.

He also loved riding motorcycles, even though both she and his mother wished he wouldn't, and even as he accumulated injuries on his Harley-Davidson bike.

He also had a passion for taking photos. The last one he sent to her was a picture of freshly blooming flowers in his mother's garden in Watertown.

"I'll never erase it from my phone," she said.

PLYMOUTH — Lindsay Clancy told a psychiatrist that she was standing by the refrigerator in the kitchen of her Duxbury home on Jan. 24, 2023, about to cook chicken nuggets for her children, when she suddenly heard a man's voice telling her to kill them and herself, according to testimony Tuesday at her murder trial.

It was about 5:34 p.m. and she had just ended a call with her then-husband, Patrick, who she had sent out minutes earlier to pick up medicine for their daughter at a nearby pharmacy and takeout dinner at a restaurant in neighboring Plymouth.

Lindsay Clancy said the voice came from outside her head and was constant, telling her over and over again, "This is your last chance, you have to kill your kids and then kill yourself," Gregory Saathoff, a forensic psychiatrist hired by prosecutors to evaluate Clancy told jurors.

Saathoff testified that Clancy told him she kept hearing the voice over and over again as she led 3-year-old Dawson down to the basement and strangled him with an exercise band, then did the same to 5-year-old Cora and 8-month-old Callan.

"Then just as soon as it started, it stopped, when she had finished killing the children," Saathoff said. Then, he said, Clancy recounted grabbing a knife from a butcher block in the kitchen, going upstairs to her bedroom, cutting her wrists and neck, taking pills, and jumping out a second-story window.

It was the first time since the trial began five weeks ago in Plymouth Superior Court that jurors were offered a timeline of precisely when Clancy strangled her children, and in what order, based on interviews she gave Saathoff in May and June of this year.

However, Saathoff, a senior psychiatrist for the FBI's behavioral analysis unit, told jurors he didn't believe Clancy's claim that she killed her children because of a voice in her head. He said it was highly unusual for someone to hear auditory hallucinations only once, as Clancy claimed she did. And he testified that she had offered different accounts about the slayings to her former husband and other psychiatrists.

"What was significant to me is she had not spoken about hearing voices before that," said Saathoff, who is also a professor at University of Virginia School of Medicine. "That was unusual and also what was very unusual was the fact that the voice stopped with the death or the strangling of her youngest son, Callan."

Saathoff was the third witness called by prosecutors to rebut defense mental health experts who testified last week that Clancy was suffering from a postpartum psychotic episode when she killed her children and should not be held criminally responsible.

Judge William F. Sullivan told jurors that Saathoff, who will resume testifying Wednesday, is the prosecution's last witness. Closing arguments are expected Thursday.

Clancy, 36, who was paralyzed from the waist down by her suicide attempt and appears in court in a wheelchair, has admitted killing her children. However, she has pleaded not guilty to three counts of first-degree murder, asserting an insanity defense.

Her lawyer, Kevin Reddington, has argued that she was suffering from postpartum psychosis at the time of the slayings, was unable to appreciate the wrongfulness of her conduct, and lacks criminal responsibility because she was unable to obey the law.

Prosecutors allege the murders were premeditated and carried out with extreme atrocity and cruelty by Clancy, who wanted to kill herself because she was tired of her life. She decided to take the children with her because she didn't trust anyone else to care for them.

Patrick Clancy testified earlier in the trial that Dawson was sitting on the couch eating chicken nuggets and green beans when he left to pick up medicine for Cora and dinner for him and Lindsay.

He testified that he called his wife from CVS to ask whether a generic version of the medication for their daughter was acceptable, but she didn't pick up. But he said she called him right back, and it seemed as if she'd been "in the middle of something," and he guessed she was giving the children a bath. When he returned home, he discovered she had killed them.

On Tuesday, Saathoff questioned Lindsay Clancy's claim that she was standing by the open refrigerator door, getting chicken nuggets to cook for her children, when she heard the voice telling her to kill the children.

He noted that Patrick Clancy's testimony that Dawson was eating chicken nuggets when he left was supported by crime scene photographs previously shown to jurors.

Saathoff suggested those statements show that Lindsay Clancy's account is unreliable.

"In this case the widely divergent reports ... raise questions about what she is telling me and how things are happening," he said. "Certainly that's a cause for significant concern."

Saathoff told jurors that he concluded that Clancy "had certainly suffered with symptoms of mental illness, depression, and anxiety," as well as suicidal ideation and intrusive thoughts.

But he testified that Clancy offered a different timeline to a psychiatrist who evaluated her for the defense about when she heard the voice on the night of the slayings.

Man charged with murder in fatal stabbing in Lynn

By Bryan Hecht
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

A Lynn man was charged with first-degree murder in the fatal stabbing of a 52-year-old Fitchburg man near Lynn Common this month, according to court records.

Cody Smith, 31, pleaded not guilty in Lynn District Court Monday to killing Rafael Gonzalez Cruz on Aug. 6 and was ordered held without bail, court records show. He is due back for a probable cause hearing on Sept. 30.

Smith's lawyer did not immediately return a phone call Tuesday.

At 6:18 a.m., police responded to a report of a deceased man near 200 South Common St., at the edge of Lynn Common, Essex District Attorney Paul F. Tucker's office said in a statement.

Officers found Cruz suffering from "apparent sharp force trauma," and he was pronounced dead at the scene, prosecutors said.

The death was later ruled a homicide. Cruz was fatally stabbed, a spokesperson for Tucker's office confirmed.

Investigators said in court records they zeroed in on Smith as a suspect using various pieces of evidence, including eyewitnesses who identified him.

Court records show a warrant was issued for his arrest on Aug. 13, and he was taken into custody last Thursday.

Judge Leo Fama allowed a motion by prosecutors preventing Smith and his attorney from obtaining information about their witnesses or viewing any police reports, records show.

Smith, who, according to a police report, is nicknamed "Cody Stacks," has two cases pending in Lynn District Court for allegedly breaking into a car and possessing crack cocaine when he was arrested in May 2025.

Smith also faces a drug possession charge in Peabody District Court, records show.

Mass. offers schools guidance on ICE

By Colin A. Young
STATE HOUSE NEWS SERVICE

As schools across Massachusetts prepare to welcome students back and adjust to new responsibilities under the state's recent immigrant protection law, Governor Maura Healey's office Tuesday shared new guidance for handling situations that involve immigration enforcement at schools and child care centers.

The state guidelines provide "clear steps to follow if ICE agents arrive on site or request access to a student, child, or their information," the administration said, and touches on considerations like designating staff points of contact, reviewing and responding to requests, involving legal counsel when appropriate, documenting interactions, notifying families, and protecting confidential information.

The immigrant protection law that Healey signed Aug. 5 expanded protections against warrantless civil immigration arrests to courthouses, public schools, child care centers, and health care facilities. It also required schools and state-funded or licensed child care programs to adopt policies governing interactions with civil law enforcement — and have them in effect by Sept. 1 or the first day of the 2026–27 school year, whichever is earlier.

"As families prepare for the new school year, every child should feel safe walking into their classroom and every parent should feel confident dropping them off," Healey said in a statement. "The PROTECT Act makes clear that schools and child care programs are places for children to learn and grow, not places for ICE to target families. These resources give educators and providers the clear guidance they need to put those protections into practice."

The Department of Elementary and Secondary Education released model policies and procedures for school districts, charter schools, and educational collaboratives on Tuesday. The administration's suggestions "also provide procedures for alerting school communities when civil law enforcement agents are confirmed on school grounds while protecting individual privacy" and for updating student emergency contacts.

Policies and guidance for licensed and state-funded child care centers, family child care homes, school-aged child care programs and group care facilities came from the Department of Early Education and Care. EEC also partnered with the Massachusetts Office for Refugees and Immigrants to provide "Know Your Rights" training for the early education and care sector, including information about immigrant and refugee rights, available legal resources, and interactions with immigration and law enforcement officers.

When Healey signed the law in Chelsea, the city's manager said it offered relief to many in the community who have been afraid to go to work, school, and other locations over fears of running into ICE agents. Chelsea has among the highest foreign-born populations in Massachusetts, with US Census numbers showing about 46 percent of the city's residents are immigrants.

"We in the city have seen the cost of that fear: empty classroom seats, neighbors who have left the state, businesses that have shuttered, and trust broken between residents and our institutions that are meant to protect them," Fidel Maltez, Chelsea's city manager, said.

House Speaker Ron Mariano, a former teacher, said "dangerous and illegal actions taken by federal immigration agents have immigrants in Massachusetts living in fear as they go about their daily lives, including when they bring their children to school."

He said the new law and the guidance for schools "are about ensuring that the Commonwealth is doing everything it can to preserve schools as safe spaces for learning, rather than allowing them to become opportunities for warrantless harassment and detainment."

BSO musicians secure key gains in new 3-year contract

orchestras, involving players as never before in the process of artistic decision making and planning," he said in a statement. The "agreement guarantees the musicians a critically enhanced role in the engagement of titled conductors, including the Music Director. With both musicians and management working in earnest, we look forward to presenting the finest in classical music for our devoted audiences."

Today's outcome seemed far from certain at times. The musicians voted Saturday to authorize a strike in advance of the negotiations' deadline. By Sunday, however, an agreement seemed close at hand when the two sides announced a 48-hour contract extension, adding that a ratification vote was in the works.

Unfolding during the greatest crisis of the BSO's 145-year history, the talks inevitably became a proxy for the broader debate over the BSO's future.

The BSO's board shocked musicians in early March when it announced it would not renew Nelsons' contract.

The decision has riven the organization. Musicians, most of whom are loyal to the maestro, remain deeply upset with management, stating publicly that they've lost faith in Smith and BSO board chair Barbara Hostetter. Management, meanwhile, has sought to turn the page, arguing the symphony must take decisive action to address dire financial and demographic challenges and that Nelsons was "not aligned on future vision."

Deep mistrust continues to roil the organization, as many players demand a fuller accounting of Nelsons' dismissal and more clarity on the BSO's future direction.

Nevertheless, both management and musicians described the new contract as a milestone that will likely be watched closely by other orchestras across the country.

By most modern standards, the resulting contract represents several financial wins for the players. In addition to 4 percent annual raises (4.5 percent in the third year). The guaranteed base salary for musicians will rise to $230,000 by year three; the contract also increases their guaranteed pension to $94,000, the highest in the field.

Players also pursued greater influence in the artistic life of the organization, previously describing it as a necessary step to rebuild trust after Nelsons' dismissal, which caught musicians by surprise.

The issue was among the thorniest the two parties had to negotiate, but the parties ultimately agreed to several areas of collaboration that prioritize the orchestra's voice.

Most notably, the new contract tips the balance in favor of the players in the upcoming search to replace Nelsons. Musicians previously held a minority five of 11 spots on the search committee.

The new contract expands the search committee to 12 members, dedicating six spots to players. Significantly, any candidate recommended to the board must not only earn a majority of committee votes, but also a two-thirds supermajority of players' votes. The contract further stipulates that the board will only hire a candidate that has been qualified by the search committee.

Nevertheless, management declined to cede any explicit decision-making rights, and the new contract does not grant players decision or veto power when it comes to the organization's artistic choices.

Instead, the contract prioritizes musicians' voices in what was described as a collaborative process.

For example, the contract stipulates the formation of a new Artistic Liaison Committee that will meet monthly with musicians. The committee will solicit recommended lists of guest conductors and artists from orchestra musicians, with management committing to prioritizing names on the list.

Smith called it a "new model."

"It allows for a level of transparency about program planning that has never existed at the Boston Symphony, or probably any orchestra," said Smith. "It will allow for real collaboration about what happens on our stages."

Hostetter said the new contract reflects a commitment on the part of stewards to leave the organization stronger than they found it.

"I am deeply grateful to our musicians, our leadership and staff, and everyone in the BSO community whose collaboration made it possible," Hostetter said in a statement. "As the BSO enters its next chapter, we will build on this momentum to ensure the organization is positioned to reach even greater heights."

David Rufino, president of the Boston Musicians Association, said the contract would "set a new standard for American Orchestras."

"The agreement guarantees the musicians a meaningful role engaging collaborators and planning repertoire that ensures artistic excellence," he said in a statement. "The Players' Committee's tireless efforts, the unwavering support of BSO musicians and patrons, and BSO management's agreement to try something new, all contributed to this momentous achievement."

Editor's note: Barbara Hostetter, chair of the BSO's Board of Trustees, is the co-founder of the Barr Foundation, which has supported the Globe's reporting on education and inequality.

R.I. beach treated to free Maroon 5 concert

By Carlos Muñoz
GLOBE STAFF

NARRAGANSETT, R.I. — A crowd of thousands turned out to watch pop-rock band Maroon 5 in a once-a-decade free concert on the town beach hosted by philanthropist and hedge fund manager Joseph P. Healey Saturday night.

The Rhode Island native has made it a tradition to celebrate his milestone birthdays with a free concert for locals. In 2006, he hired singer-songwriter and former Police front man Sting to celebrate turning 40, and in 2016 his 50th birthday bash featured rock star Lenny Kravitz. The shows are held in front of his waterfront mansion, known as Sand Castle By-The-Sea, adjacent to the town beach.

The town announced the concert in a Facebook post on Thursday afternoon, just two days before the event. The artist is usually a well-kept secret, but this year Healey told the Globe Maroon 5 would headline the party. (Rumors about Taylor Swift performing sparked concerns about large numbers of Swifties converging on the beach.)

Visitors withstood rain showers earlier in the day and scrambled to claim spots on the sand, spreading out beach towels or setting up folding chairs, though during the show most just stood, sang, and danced.

"They actually have video on the parking lots which I just learned today," said Kristin Solomon of Narragansett, who attended with her husband and son. "I was kind of monitoring that all morning, being like, 'Are they filling up? Should we go right now?'"

Most parking lots were full by 5 p.m. The concert began at 8 p.m.

Town resident Matthew

Thousands of visitors crowded Narragansett Town Beach to hear Maroon 5 on Saturday.

Smith, who graduated a year behind Healey at Bishop Hendrick High School in Warwick, R.I., called Healey a "wonderful gentleman." Smith came to the beach for the 2006 birthday celebration, when Sting surprised the crowd.

Healey has helped fund renovations to Narragansett's Maury Looijens Memorial Library, and in 2020, he made a $20 million donation to Brown to create full scholarships for US military veterans at the Ivy League school.

Since 2001, he has also provided scholarships to students at Bishop Hendricken, and now pays the tuition of four students in each grade every year — a total of 16 students at any given time.

Since the once-in-a-decade birthday event began, Smith said, it has grown substantially.

"There was probably about a tenth of the amount of people that you see here now," he said of the 2016 show. "Lenny Kravitz was here — it was a beautiful day — and we opted not to go. [In] the pictures that we saw, people were knee deep in the water."

Smith and his wife showed up Saturday to meet friends.

They weren't expecting to grab a front-row seat, but planned to just find a spot where they could enjoy the band.

Many attendees spread out to the surf where people played in the water. Beyond them, a flotilla of paddleboarders and boats formed to catch the show from the water.

Spectators without a clear view of the stage could watch on jumbo screens and see Maroon 5 with frontman Adam Levine. The rocker encouraged them to sing along with hits that started with "Stereo Hearts," and included "This Love," "Sugar," and others.

Maroon 5 has generated a worldwide following that has won the hybrid rock and R&B act three Grammy Awards.

Solomon said she was in the massive crowd when Lenny Kravitz performed a decade ago. She described Saturday's crowd simply, saying, "This is probably going to be busier than July Fourth."

Another attendee, A.J. Lee of Cumberland, R.I., made the trip not knowing for certain what he'd find or who would be playing. Standing near the back of the crowd with his shoes soaked from waves, he said the mystery and the setting made for something he'd never experienced before.

"You have to be just an incredible person at heart, to not only have your birthday celebrated with so many people, but to bring in so many talented artists, mostly universally beloved artists," Lee said. "It's just such a selfless thing to do, and I wish him [Healey] a happy birthday."

Narragansett Police provided security and crowd control, and on Sunday they thanked the South Kingstown and North Kingstown police departments as well as the Rhode Island State Police and the Rhode Island Department of Environmental Management police department for assisting.

"A huge thank you to all of our residents and guests who came out and made it such a great evening," they posted on Facebook Sunday.

"Happy Birthday, Joe! Thanks for giving Narragansett one heck of a party!" they added.

Vt. removes hundreds from voter rolls after errors are found

Monday, though the issue will continue to be litigated as election officials prepare to mail out ballots ahead of the Nov. 3 mid-term elections.

The errors in Vermont originated in the state's "motor voter" program, which allows people to automatically register to vote as they apply for a driver's license. Officials said an audit had found that, over 25 years, the Department of Motor Vehicles had accidentally sent the names of approximately 20,000 people to the secretary of state's office, even though those people had opted out of registering to vote at the time they obtained or renewed their driver's license.

The audit found that many of those 20,000 had registered to vote at other times, so their names were left on the rolls. About 900 had never otherwise registered, so their names were removed.

Officials attributed the mistakes to "human error" that took place when election procedures changed and IT systems were upgraded.

Vermont has had universal mail-in balloting for general elections since the COVID-19 pandemic limited in-person voting. That means all registered voters in the state are sent a ballot in the months before a November election, though they are also entitled to vote at the polls instead.

Copeland Hanzas acknowledged that many of the 900 would have received ballots in the mail during previous election cycles, but none had returned one, the audit found. She said it was important to address the issue before her office mailed out ballots for this year's general election in the coming weeks.

"Nobody on that list has executed a ballot," she said. "Nobody has voted in our elections, and so we are simply heading off any future action that someone might take."

Vermont Secretary of State Sarah Copeland Hanzas and Governor Phil Scott praised the effort to fix the errors.

The state first became aware of the issue last winter, Copeland Hanzas said, when a resident informed her office that they had been added to the voter rolls despite having opted out at the DMV.

Officials did not, however, take action until about a month ago, when New Jersey officials revealed that about 6,600 residents of that state had been improperly registered to vote, allowing roughly 400 noncitizens to cast ballots. That led to a political firestorm in the state and imperiled the immigration status of those who improperly voted.

The New Jersey imbroglio, Copeland Hanzas said, "was a real eye-opener for a lot of folks."

"When the New Jersey news hit, I said, you know, 'Now is the time,'" she said. "I wanted to be sure that we could say with a straight face that we did everything we could to ensure that our voter registration list is as accurate as possible."

Like many states, Vermont issues driver privilege cards to noncitizens, who would not be eligible to vote. But the audit did not make clear how many of the 900 improperly registered voters were noncitizens, according to Andrew Collier, commissioner of the Vermont Department of Motor Vehicles, and Copeland Hanzas.

"It is reasonable to expect there may be a few people on that . . . list who were not eligible to vote because they weren't citizens, and we have removed them," Copeland Hanzas said.

Though state officials acknowledged they had erred, they said the situation should not provide ammunition to Trump and others who argue mail-in balloting is problematic — and should be limited by the feds.

"I want to be clear: Voting by mail is safe, secure and reliable," Scott said. "The federal government has no business encroaching on the states on how we administer free and fair elections. Mail-in ballots work well in Vermont."

Man charged in fatal May boat crash

►BOAT

the crash, taking “both hands off the wheel,” Hayden said.

Navigation data showed the boat was traveling at about 36 miles per hour when it slammed nearly head-on into a Logan runway approach pier shortly after 11 p.m., prosecutors said.

A Suffolk grand jury indicted Shieh on one count of involuntary manslaughter, one count of operating a boat while intoxicated causing death, two counts of operating a boat while intoxicated causing serious bodily injury, one count of using a boat without authority, and one count of a Logan Airport security violation, Hayden said.

Shieh turned himself in and is scheduled to be arraigned Wednesday morning in Suffolk Superior Court, officials said.

An attorney for Shieh could not immediately be reached for comment Tuesday, and officials at Fan Pier Marina also could not be reached.

Lee Gordon, a spokesperson for Brunswick Corporation, which owns Freedom Boat Club, said in a statement that Shieh’s membership has been terminated and the club continues to cooperate fully with investigators.

“As we have previously stated, the individual was not authorized to use the vessel, which was taken without permission after the club had closed for the day,” Gordon said.

Freedom Boat bills itself as the largest boat club in the world with 450 marina locations worldwide, according to the company’s website.

Prosecutors said Shieh allegedly “drank a mix of alcoholic beverages” with friends at Reel-House and several other Seaport bars before the crash.

His friends eventually went home, while Shieh stayed at ReelHouse and struck up a conversation with Dankert and two other women in their early 20s, Hayden said. Shieh, who did not previously know the women, eventually offered to take them out on a boat.

Shieh did not own a boat but was a member of the Freedom Boat Club, prosecutors said. The club prohibits members from using its boats at night.

After leaving the bar with Dankert and her friends, Shieh went to Fan Pier Marina, where Freedom Boat vessels were docked, officials said.

Shieh allegedly used a “transient” key card he was not authorized to have to get into the marina after hours, Assistant District Attorney Ashlee Mastrangelo said. The passes are meant to provide 24-hour marina access to people who keep their own boats there, she said. It is unclear how Shieh obtained one.

The keys to the Freedom club boats were stored in a box

BOSTON EMS

Prosecutors said navigation data showed the boat was traveling at about 36 miles per hour when it slammed nearly head-on into a Logan runway approach pier on May 13.

out of sight, Mastrangelo said. But Shieh was a regular user of the club and had been present many times when boats were checked in and out.

Shieh and the three women boarded one of the boats and headed into the harbor after dark, prosecutors said. The boat had no exterior lights for nighttime use, Hayden said.

Surveillance video showed the boat negotiate a hairpin turn before going directly toward the Logan runway approach pier, which is a restricted area, and then striking the pier, Hayden said.

Dankert suffered a critical head injury in the crash. Mastrangelo said the collision caused a canopy over the helm of the boat to snap backward, and those aboard appeared to be thrown toward the back of the boat.

Dankert’s cause of death was a fracture to the back of her skull, prosecutors said. Shieh and the two surviving women also suffered multiple serious injuries which required hospitalization, a spokesperson for the district attorney’s office said.

Emergency responders encountered difficult conditions after the crash.

In “pitch darkness,” State Police, Environmental Police, and Coast Guard responders made their way down a slope of slippery jetty boulders covered in seaweed to reach the four people and take them to waiting ambulances, Hayden said.

“What transpired after the crash can only be described as a tremendously heroic rescue operation,” Hayden said. “Their efforts, under extraordinary difficult conditions, deserve enormous praise.”

UNION COLLEGE

Andover’s Elizabeth Dankert was killed in the crash.

Dankert was taken to Massachusetts General Hospital, where she was pronounced dead.

The indictment resulted from a months-long investigation that involved State Police, Massport, Environmental Police, the Coast Guard, and Boston police and firefighters, Hayden said.

Among the evidence investigators gathered was a cell-phone divers recovered from the bottom of Boston Harbor near the crash site about a week later. Authorities believe the phone belonged to Dankert.

State Police Lieutenant Colonel Jeffrey Boutwell said troopers were alerted to the crash after one of the passengers called 911 from the boat. He said troopers have spent months collecting evidence and interviewing witnesses to reconstruct what happened.

“These investigations take time,” Hayden said. “Getting all of the relevant information, all the video information, all the information from a car or a boat’s computer system takes an enormous amount of time and an enormous amount of really detailed scrutiny.”

Dankert graduated from Union College in New York in 2024, where she played soccer. She previously attended Central Catholic High School in Lawrence.

Dankert’s death drew an outpouring of tributes from her family, friends, and the Union College community. Her family remembered her as someone who “radiated joy and light and happiness in every space she filled.”

Mastrangelo said Tuesday that she and a victim-witness advocate have remained in contact with Dankert’s family and informed them about the charges.

“I think they’re still very much mourning,” she said. “At this point, they’re in mourning and they’re prepared for the many steps ahead between now and when this case resolves.

Michelle Menken, a lawyer for the Dankert family, issued a statement saying, “There is some measure of relief in finally learning what happened that fateful night.”

The family is focused on “the seemingly insurmountable tasks of learning to go on without their beloved daughter and sister, Lizzie,” she said.

A spokesperson for HarbourVest Partners confirmed on Tuesday that Shieh was a former employee for the Boston private equity firm. They said he is no longer an employee, but declined further comment.

Tompkins trial opens with dueling versions of case

►TOMPKINS

Weinberg argued that Perullo “negotiated a cynical exchange” for immunity from prosecution. The prosecution’s case was hinging on Perullo’s testimony, which Weinberg labeled “uncorroborated.”

“He had everything at stake,” Weinberg said of Perullo.

Weinberg showed one email blast from Perullo encouraging people to support Tompkins’s bid for reelection in the midst of sending Tompkins checks refunding him for his investment in Ascend. The email called Tompkins a “tireless public servant” and a “man of integrity.” For Weinberg, that message and others where Perullo expressed a friendship with Tompkins, did not evoke an extortion victim.

Tompkins, he said, was powerless to harm Ascend and there never was any threat from Tompkins to the company.

“He had no power over them,” said Weinberg.

Moreover, Tompkins would not damage Ascend because that would mean harming Andrea Cabral, who once ran Ascend’s local operations. Cabral was Tompkins’s former boss at the sheriff’s office and “best friend” of 40-plus years, according to Weinberg, going back to their time together as students at Boston College.

“He would never harm Andrea Cabral,” said Weinberg.

Cabral will testify that Ascend was never at risk, said Weinberg. Pointing out that Cabral did not seek immunity from prosecution, Weinberg told the jury that her testimony is trustworthy and that it would “extinguish the foundation of the government’s case.”

“He’s not only presumed innocent,” said Weinberg of Tompkins. “He is innocent.”

Tompkins, 69, is a well-known local Democratic politician, a ubiquitous and glad-handing presence in Greater Boston, who as sheriff oversaw the Nashua Street Jail and South Bay House of Correction for years.

After his indictment last year, Tompkins said he would go on leave and designated Mark Lawhorne as the “special sheriff” who would fill his seat on an interim basis.

Jury selection began on Monday and finished Tuesday morning, after which both sides presented their opening statements.

The federal indictment alleges Tompkins pressured Ascend by threatening to revoke a partnership between the sheriff’s office and the company, which was central to its local licensing application.

While applying for a necessary license, Ascend needed to show how the business would have a “positive impact,” especially on communities adversely affected by the nation’s war on drugs, according to the indictment in the case. For Ascend, that requirement was allegedly met through its partnership with Tompkins on a program to train and hire people recently released from jail, prosecutors said.

This partnership allegedly gave Tompkins leverage; without it, according to prosecutors, company officials feared they would not have their license renewed to operate a shop downtown.

Chao, the federal prosecutor, said Tuesday Tompkins brought up that partnership to Perullo, telling him “I helped you get Friend Street,” referencing Ascend’s location near TD Garden. That, Chao said, was part of “subtle but ominous pressure” placed on Perullo. If Perullo didn’t give Tompkins stock, said Chao, “that could be a problem.”

“Ladies and gentlemen, that’s what corruption looks like,” he said.

Chao showed the jury a text from Tompkins to Perullo after the company’s stock dipped, where the sheriff told the cannabis executive, “I need to pull that last 13k out of Ascend.” Perullo sent Tompkins a collection of checks that returned the sheriff’s investment, some of which featured false statements that suggested they were money for a loan repayment and an expense related to a professional law enforcement organization, according to investigators.

“Investing in cannabis held risk — except if you were Steven Tompkins,” said Chao.

After the opening salvos from both sets of attorneys on Tuesday, Abner Kurtin, a co-founder of Ascend, took the stand. Weinberg asked Kurtin if Perullo was ever in fear of Tompkins.

“He never discussed it,” said Kurtin.

The trial was scheduled to continue on Wednesday.

Maine attorney slams Vance’s remarks about ICE shooting victim

“The vice president’s suggestion that killing Johan Sebastián was justified or acceptable as a cost of addressing the illicit fentanyl trade is completely disingenuous and purposefully misleading,” he said in a statement.

Gideon also questioned the accuracy of Vance’s assertion that “tens of thousands” of Maine residents have died from fentanyl overdoses. He noted that Maine recorded 7,600 drug-induced deaths over a period of nearly 30 years — from 1997 to 2025 — from all drugs combined, not just fentanyl. He also said overdose deaths in the state were falling significantly (by nearly 16 percent in 2023 and another 19 percent in 2024) before Trump’s immigration crackdown.

In his comments, Vance acknowledged that Durán Guerrero was not the target of any investigation. He said, however, that immigration agents felt “the person they were trying to arrest ... posed a danger to the community” after Durán Guerrero allegedly tried to leave the scene.

Witnesses to the shooting said they heard Durán Guerrero, gravely injured and dragged from the car, tell immigration agents, “I tried to stop.”

“In his answer, the Vice President identified no weapon, no violent crime committed by Johan Sebastián, and no specific threat of death or serious physical injury,” Gideon said, noting that Department of Homeland Security policy limits the use of deadly force by immigration agents.

Vance also referred to a federal investigation, saying that Democrats are “being dishonest if they say we’re not investigating that case.”

Federal officials have previously said the FBI responded to the scene and the Department of Homeland Security’s inspector general’s office was notified immediately after the shooting.

But Gideon said federal officials have yet to contact Durán Guerrero’s family or their legal team about the shooting.

“No federal agency has identified to the family what component is conducting the investigation, what its scope is, or who is leading it,” he said.

Vance suggested that such an investigation would determine whether criminal charges are warranted and whether allegations against the agents are “actually legitimate.”

“Everybody is entitled to their case, not in the court of public opinion, but a court trial by their juries — an actual, real investigation — if that’s what ultimately happens,” he said.

David Brouillette, the ICE agent identified as the agent who shot and killed Durán Guerrero, has been accused of volatile and threatening behavior toward friends and family, including allegations of domestic violence against his former wives, which advocates say should have prevented him from being hired as an ICE agent.

A visa application for Durán Guerrero’s family, signed by Maine’s attorney general to certify they were victims of a crime, suggests that state authorities are also investigating under two criminal statutes: murder and manslaughter.

Vance’s comments also drew a sharp response from Maine Democrats. US Representative Chellie Pingree described Vance’s comments as “callous, smug, and offensive.” And Troy Jackson, a Senate candidate challenging Republican Susan Collins, called the vice president a “dirtbag.”

“We lost a person that JD Vance seems to not give a [expletive] about,” Jackson said. “That should piss us all off.”

Federal officials previously described the Biddeford operation, conducted outside Durán Guerrero’s apartment, as “targeted surveillance on the last known address of an illegal alien with a final order of removal.”

But Maine lawmakers have contradicted that account, saying neither Durán Guerrero nor his roommate, whom ICE appeared to be targeting, had a final order of removal.

Officials have not commented further on the identity of the target, the purpose of the operation, or why they attempted to stop the car Durán Guerrero was driving.

This key state Senate primary is shaping up to be a battle of Boston biotech vs. builders

Lander, Brownsberger tap into the pockets of notable industry leaders

By Shirley Leung
GLOBE COLUMNIST

As Will Brownsberger and Daniel Lander square off in a key state Senate primary next week, some of the biggest names in Boston real estate and life sciences are opening up their wallets.

Lander, a former aide to Boston Mayor Michelle Wu, is running to unseat a two-decade veteran of Beacon Hill who's one of the most powerful senators there. The first-time candidate has notched endorsements from Wu and US Senator Elizabeth Warren, and he has a not-so-secret ace up his sleeve: his father's Rolodex.

Lander is the son of Eric Lander, the founding director of the Broad Institute of MIT and Harvard. And while Dad isn't doing media interviews about his son's candidacy, Daniel Lander is certainly tapping into his famous father's network.

Lander's donor list includes a who's who of Boston biotech: current Broad director Todd Golub, Broad scientist and CRISPR pioneer Feng Zhang, Vertex founder Josh Boger, Harvard Medical School dean George Daley, LinkedIn cofounder Reid Hoffman, and three members of the Broad family whose founding gift created the eponymous biomedical research center.

Daniel Lander, who's running to rein in the high cost of living, said he's leaning on his dad's contacts for donations because he's up against an incumbent who's a formidable fund-raiser. Lander's $210,000 represents an impressive haul for a Senate campaign, but Brownsberger has brought in more than double that, according to campaign filings. (Hat tip to colleague Scooty Nickerson for helping to crunch numbers.)

Many of Lander's donors have ties to the Canada retaliates with tariffs up to 50%

New levies generally mirror US additions

By Ian Austen
NEW YORK TIMES

OTTAWA, Ontario — Canada announced retaliatory tariffs as high as 50 percent on hundreds of American products on Tuesday, just days after the collapse of trade talks triggered punishing tariffs from the Trump administration.

As a trade war between the countries intensifies, Canada will start collecting tariffs of 50 percent, 25 percent, and 15 percent on about 700 products beginning Sept. 8. The most significant measure is a doubling of tariffs on American steel and aluminum to 50 percent. But the list of products affected ranges from household rolls of aluminum foil to railway locomotives and steel bridges.

Many of the American products Canada will now tax mirror the Canadian exports hit by the new US tariffs, particularly in clothing, forestry products, tools, and electronics including smartphones. But Canada is also targeting costly consumer products like dishwashers, washing machines, and stoves.

A wide array of fish, frozen and fresh, also dominates the list.

The new Canadian levies cover about $20 billion per year of imports from the United States, the same value as the Canadian exports affected by the tariffs.

After the collapse of the negotiations in Washington, Prime Minister Mark Carney of Canada, an economist and former central banker, said Canada would match the American tariffs "dollar for dollar." But he also acknowledged that the move "will raise costs and reduce choice for Canadians."

Carney left the announcement of the tariffs to several of his Cabinet ministers and had no public events on his schedule for Tuesday. He did privately brief the leaders of opposition political parties on the trade situation.

One of the major sources of tension in the trade negotiations was the United States' 25 percent tariff on automobiles, a major export for Canada, introduced about 18 months ago. On Tuesday, Canada said it would keep its retaliatory tariff on American-made cars at 25 percent and maintain a system that allows companies that build cars in Canada to continue to import

Historic Union Oyster House to be acquired by Houston family, spokesperson confirms

New owner plans no changes; city set to review transfer of liquor license

The Union Oyster House, a landmark on Boston's Freedom Trail where tourists, sports stars, and former presidents have dined, is being acquired by a Houston-based family, a spokesperson confirmed Tuesday night.

"The Fertitta family of Houston Texas [sic] are acquiring the Union Oyster House, America's oldest restaurant and a National Historic Landmark," a representative of the family said in an email to the Globe. Terms of the deal were not disclosed.

Once completed, the sale will mark the end of the restaurant's longtime ownership by Joe Milano, the noted businessman whose family has owned the restaurant since 1970.

"Upon closing of the transaction, the Fertitta family will continue to run Union Oyster House just as it has been operated for more than 200 years, with no changes to its staff or operations," the spokesperson said.

"The Fertitta family looks forward to carrying its storied traditions forward for generations to come."

Confirmation of the pending acquisition comes as the city's licensing board on Wednesday is due to review a license transfer application for the iconic restaurant.

Union Oyster House has applied to transfer its all-alcoholic beverages license to an out-of-state limited liability company, according to filings with the Boston Licensing Board.

The license transfer hearing was previously reported by Universal Hub.

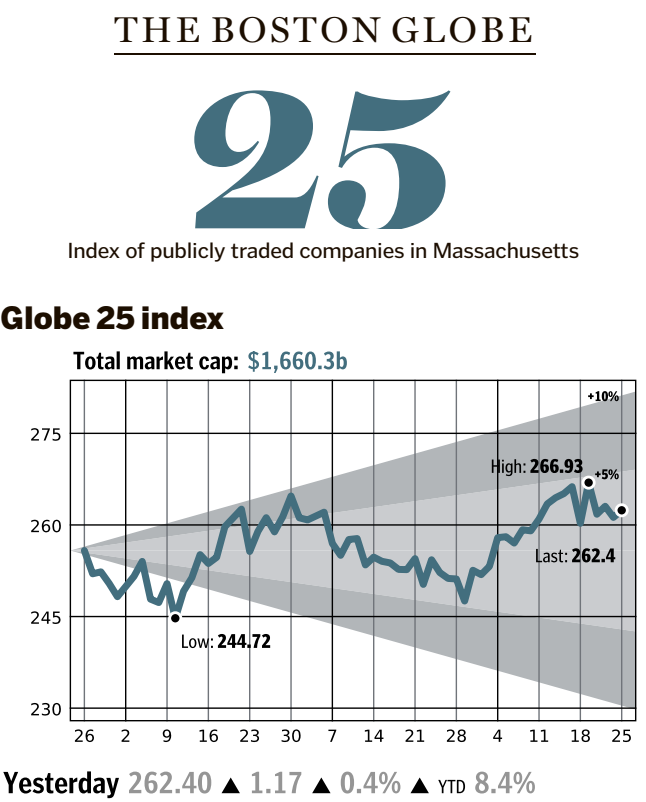

Union Oyster House, which celebrates its 200th anniversary this month, has been owned by North End native Milano for decades. Founded in 1826, the iconic establishment has long been a mainstay of Boston.

Oil falls as new sanctions hit Iran

Oil prices fell on Tuesday, which helped ease worries in the bond market and support stock prices. Some of the strongest action was in the oil market, where the price for a barrel of Brent crude fell 3.6 percent to $87.27 for a second decline following 13 gains in 14 days. The drop came even though tensions between the US and Iran seemed to ratchet higher after the Trump administration announced new sanctions to further hurt Iran's economy. Brent's price zigzagged between $72 and $102 last month as hopes rose and fell that the US and Iran could reach a deal that would allow oil tankers to freely exit the Persian Gulf. A delegation from Pakistan left Iran Tuesday after talks with Iran's president on reopening the Strait of Hormuz and reviving talks to end the conflict, the Pakistani military said. Pakistan Interior Minister Mohsin Naqvi said a meeting with Iranian President Masoud Pezeshkian had been "very positive and productive." Tuesday's drop in oil prices reined in worries about high inflation, which had helped drive Treasury yields higher in the bond market. The yield on the 10-year Treasury fell to 4.63 percent from 4.70 percent late Monday.

Study: Child care hurt by food costs

Federal dollars hard to access

By Alison Kuznitz
STATE HOUSE NEWS SERVICE

Child care providers are financially struggling to keep up with escalating food costs, and yet many early education programs are choosing not to participate in a federal nutrition assistance program due to administrative hassles, according to an upcoming report from Boston-based researchers.

While Massachusetts lawmakers have celebrated their investments to make universal free school meals possible, state policy makers are "generally unaware" the initiative does not extend to young children in child care settings, according to a new study from Children's HealthWatch, a research and policy network that's headquartered at Boston Medical Center. One large center provider reported spending over $400,000 on food expenses that are only partially reimbursed, and lamented that money cannot be saved and instead invested in teacher salaries.

Researchers, who plan to release the full report later this week, highlighted their findings Tuesday during a Zoom meeting with Strategies for Children. The study incorporates interviews and focus groups with 26 child care professionals who live and work in Greater Boston, central Mass., Western Mass., and Washington, D.C., said Children's HealthWatch executive director Stephanie Ettinger de Cuba.

A key theme of the study was that child care providers are "severely financially constrained by the cost of food," a long-running problem that's grown more acute with inflation, Ettinger de Cuba said. One state administrator quoted in the study said it's become "much more common than before" for programs to report spending part of their Commonwealth Cares for Children state grants on food.

The federal Child and Adult Care Food Program, or CACFP, provides reimbursements for meals and snacks that are served to eligible individuals at participating child care centers, day care homes, and adult day care centers. The program is also available for meals served to children and youth at participating afterschool programs, children living in emergency shelters, and adults over age 60 or living with a disability and enrolled in day care facilities, a federal webpage says.

Reimbursements are calculated based on factors such as the facility type, the income level of participants, and the area income level, according to the CACFP Association.

The Children's HealthWatch study found the program is a "vital but flawed resource with administrative burden, insufficient reimbursement, and sometimes intrusive oversight," said research and policy analyst Carley Ruemmele. Still, children attending programs that participated in CACFP were more likely to consume a "diverse" diet and to eat fruits and vegetables, she said.

Ruemmele said only 36 percent of child care providers nationally participate in CACFP. The study captured a string of program hurdles, including "intense" recordkeeping requirements and family child care providers struggling to find sponsor organizations to enable them to enroll in CACFP.

"Given the rise in costs of living and unaffordability generally, not participating in CACFP leaves federal dollars on the table," Ruemmele said. "But for some, we heard that the juice just isn't worth the squeeze."

The study recommends policy solutions such as allocating state dollars to support CACFP sponsors, conducting a review of any additional CACFP requirements from the state, and creating a state or regional technical assistance collaborative network focused on early education and care nutrition.

Governor Maura Healey's Anti-Hunger Task Force earlier this year called for boosting participation in CACFP, plus creating a public data dashboard on nutrition program participation to track access and gaps. The report says the number of suppers provided through CACFP has not rebounded since the pandemic. Nearly 1.2 million suppers were served in 2016, compared to 760,000 in 2024.

ton's culinary scene, frequented by luminaries such as Daniel Webster and President John F. Kennedy.

The incoming management group is registered to the same Texas address as Landry's, a Houston-based hospitality company, according to state filings.

As part of the transfer, the new management group will update the license description to reflect not only the 565-person indoor capacity (split between the first floor, with its oyster bar, and the second floor dining rooms), but also its 36-person seasonal patio (though outdoor seating is nothing new for the restaurant).

Milano, reached by email Tuesday, declined to comment on the upcoming hearing, saying that "if and when there's news to share. I'll be the one to share it."

"Right now my focus is exactly where it has always been — our employees, our guests and taking care of this remarkable restaurant," he said.

City officials also declined to comment on Tuesday.

In the past, Milano has described himself as "steward" of the restaurant.

"I could not do it without the team," Milano told Wick- ed Local earlier this year.

"I'm proud to be part of history in a restaurant that has continued on for as many years as it has."

Senate district, which spans Belmont, Watertown, west Cambridge, and the Fenway and Allston-Brighton in Boston. And then there are folks like Hoffman who are involved because he worked with Eric Lander on various projects.

"You've got to work your network," said Daniel Lander, who lives in Fenway. "I'm proud that my network is a bunch of people who are in biotech, who are in innovation and have helped build so much of the economic prosperity of the last 50 years here."

Boger, who's a prolific Democratic donor, said he got involved because of Eric Lander. But Daniel Lander — a progressive who is running to the left of Brownsberger — is also exactly the type of candidate Boger typically supports. Boger, for example, is also backing Patrick Roath, the Jamaica Plain lawyer trying to unseat longtime Congressman Stephen Lynch.

"If I had come to the race myself, I would have picked Lander regardless," Boger wrote in an email.

Brownsberger's boost comes notably from commercial real estate interests, donating in droves as he faces a serious challenger. As one real estate insider told me, Brownsberger has long been seen as a friend to the industry, but only now has he asked for campaign contributions.

Boston developer Steve Samuels, BXP president Doug Linde, Boylston Properties founding principal Bill McQuillan, and Nixon Peabody real estate practice leader Christopher Froeb have all ponied up for the incumbent. Tamara Small, chief executive of real estate trade group CREDA Massachusetts (formerly NAIOP), and political action committees, such as the Greater Boston Real Estate Board and Real Estate Bar Association for Massachusetts, have donated to Brownsberger too.

Why? The Belmont Democrat has become a reliable champion of their causes. Despite being a member of the Boston delegation, he has sided with industry interests over Wu on several key issues, including a real estate transfer tax and rent control. And he joined with South Boston state Senator Nick Collins to block Wu's efforts to hike commercial property tax rates in Boston, a position Wu so disliked that it prompted her to back their primary challengers.

Brownsberger said he hasn't in the past gone out of his way to court developers. But their interests have converged as he focuses on how Massachusetts can build more housing.

"The only way we're going to have that is to make Massachusetts a place that's attractive to build ... reducing the zoning barriers, reducing all the permitting barriers, all the things that get in the way of housing," said Brownsberger. "It also means not erecting new barriers to housing production."

That's the sort of thing that makes developers jump for joy, especially with building at a decades-long low right now. Happy enough that they're willing to risk angering the mayor to back him. And amid a competitive race, Brownsberger hasn't been shy about taking their money either.

Next Tuesday, we'll find out if it's enough to keep him in office.

Canada retaliates with tariffs up to 50% on US goods them from the US tariff-free, within limits. Canadians buy more cars from the United States than they ship there.

On Monday, President Trump threatened to double the auto tariff to 50 percent, a rate that would likely doom Canadian car plants, which export upward of 90 percent of what they build. He also threatened to apply that rate to Canadian auto parts, which are currently sold free of tariffs if they qualify as North American-made under the now-shattered free trade agreement among the United States, Canada, and Mexico.

Canada imports about $272 billion in US goods a year. Canadian officials said that the government anticipates that it will spend far more on keeping Cannadian exporters in business than it will collect from the tariff. The officials, in a briefing for journalists before the announcement, noted that the intention is to protect Canadian manufacturers, not raise money.

Mélanie Joly, the trade minister, said some items on the tariff list were chosen to target states where voters have supported Trump. She declined to identify the states but said that appliances and "food products" were among those goods.

Many economists say that because Canada's economy is about one-twelfth the size of the US economy, its retaliatory tariffs will have the effect of a pea shooter in a gun battle. At the same time, most economists say, price increases caused by tariff retaliation will actually harm Canadian companies.

Opinion polls taken before Trump's new 50 percent tariffs took effect on Saturday show widespread support among Canadians for economic retaliation. Enthusiasm for the idea has been more mixed among provincial leaders.

Doug Ford, the premier of Ontario, the most populous province and the home to much of Canada's manufacturing, is a vigorous promoter of retaliation. Danielle Smith, the premier of Alberta, whose oil is overwhelmingly Canada's largest export, has urged restraint.

Trump's tariffs have always excluded oil, natural gas, the fertilizer potash, and many minerals.

Economists are skeptical about the effect of import tariffs, but many say that a different tactic could jar the US economy: taxing exports to the United States of oil, natural gas, and electricity, as well as minerals like potash, a key fertilizer. Polls suggest that the idea is even more popular with Canadians than import tariffs as a response to Trump.

"This is a game of cards," Joly said in French. "We know we have a lot of good cards in our hand. And we know not to use them right at the start."

Along with the tariffs, the Canadian government announced a variety of measures to support Canadian industries with exports now under US tariffs. They broadly resemble some of the programs used during the pandemic, like interest-free loans. Joly pointedly and repeatedly noted that they will not require any payments until after Trump leaves office.

FEDERAL RESERVE

RATES NEED TO RISE ABSENT DROP IN INFLATION, BOSTON FED’S COLLINS SAYS

The US Federal Reserve will need to raise interest rates soon unless coming data show a continued decline in inflation that remains too high and which has become a “pervasive” concern for businesses and households, Boston Fed President Susan Collins (below left) said on Tuesday. Collins said in comments posted to the Boston Fed website that the current Fed policy rate, under her base case outlook, will continue to push down prices and help with a “gradual disinflation” aided also by the recent rise in longer-term bond yields and other factors. But “should evidence of sustained inflation progress not materialize, I believe it will be appropriate to tighten policy soon to ensure we deliver price stability in a reasonable time frame. ... Concerns about high prices are pervasive in my conversations with stakeholders across New England,” Collins wrote. The Fed’s policy rate, currently in the 3.5 percent to 3.75 percent range, has been on hold since December as officials waited for inflation to ease. Collins said she still thinks that may happen, but, with inflation above target for more than five years now, she also said the Fed cannot wait forever, and is concerned that further time missing the inflation goal could shift consumer expectations in a way that makes the inflation goal harder to achieve.

There have also been over 23,000 new accounts created since iLottery launched, Bracken said, accounting for the largest monthly number since the launch of the app nearly five years ago. Bracken said there have also been over 49,000 first-time depositors. The lottery is also in the midst of the highest Megabucks jackpot since the launch of the game over 35 years ago — sitting at $23.8 million and set to be drawn Wednesday night, Bracken said. He also told the commission that overall unadjusted lottery sales for July 2026 were up $3.7 million from July 2025.

DATA CENTERS

EPA MOVES TO CURB PUBLIC INPUT ON DATA CENTERS

The Trump administration is moving to make it harder for communities to weigh in on proposed data centers, even as a backlash against the behemoth projects grows across the country. The Environmental Protection Agency plans to eliminate a federal requirement that states publicize and solicit public input on applications for air pollution permits for a range of industrial facilities, including new data centers and the power plants needed to run them. The move could prevent residents from raising concerns about — or even learning about — data centers before permits are approved and construction starts. Nearly 200 advocacy groups and more than a dozen states have voiced opposition to the change, making it the latest flashpoint in the national debate over the data centers powering the artificial intelligence boom. In some states, the permitting process is the only time the public is notified about plans for the plants. Carolyn Holran, an EPA spokesperson, said in an email that the proposal would “provide the state and local agencies most familiar with local issues the discretion to determine whether, when, and for how long to provide opportunities for public participation.” Holran said the move was intended to “responsibly speed up permitting, supporting American economic development and energy dominance. Our proposal does not alter emission standards or weaken environmental protections.” The EPA has proposed another sweeping change that would let developers start building data centers before their permits are approved. And it has exempted the gas plants that fuel many data centers from limits on pollutants that cause acid rain.

RIDESHARING

UBER TO OFFER OPTIONAL LIVESTREAMS OF TEEN RIDES TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS

Uber Technologies Inc. is rolling out a new safety feature that lets parents or guardians view a video livestream of their teenager’s ride. The feature uses the selfie camera on the driver’s phone and notifies an authorized guardian if a livestream is available for viewing within the Uber app, the rideshare company said in a statement on Tuesday. Both the teen and the driver will be alerted when the parent is tuning in. The safety measure will roll out nationwide over the coming weeks and is currently being tested in nine markets across the US: Atlanta, Phoenix, Orlando, San Antonio, Cleveland; El Paso, Texas; Raleigh-Durham, N.C.; Portland, Ore.; and the state of Rhode Island. The teen ride product, which allows children ages 13 to 17 to be matched with “highly rated, experienced drivers,” launched in 2023. Livestreaming will only be available if drivers choose to have it enabled for rides, an Uber spokesperson said.

ARTIFICIAL INTELLIGENCE

AUSTRALIA BANS GENERATIVE AI FROM OFFICIAL MUSIC CHARTS

Songs that are wholly or largely created by generative artificial intelligence will be banned from Australia’s music charts under new rules announced Tuesday, but recordings that use the technology in a supporting role will still be allowed. The Australian Recording Industry Association, which oversees the charts of the country’s most popular music, said the changes will apply from Friday. ARIA CEO Annabelle Herd said the music charts should reflect what Australians are listening to, but a chart that rewarded AI output would “undercut the very basis of the recorded music we exist to represent.” Under the changes, recordings developed using generative AI will only be allowed if they are “substantially human-made” and do not raise “stream or chart manipulation concerns,” a statement from ARIA said. For example, if a song’s lead vocal or key instrumental performance is generated by AI, the track would be ineligible, ARIA said. But a human lead vocal with AI backing vocals would be allowed. Under the rules, ARIA may remove a recording from the charts if it is deemed ineligible, although artists will be allowed to appeal the decision.

TARGET SORRY FOR HALLOWEEN COSTUME CALLED RACIST

Target apologized Monday and said it had stopped selling a children’s Halloween costume after facing widespread criticism that the design evoked racist stereotypes of Black people. The product listing on Target’s website, which appears to have been deleted, showed a circus clown costume in orange and black, with accessories including gloves, a top hat, and a mask shaped like a grinning mouth with large teeth. Critics said these features, in addition to a promotional image that appeared to show a Black child modeling the costume, mirrored caricatures from Jim Crow-era minstrel shows. Target said in a statement that it had stopped selling the costume and “was looking closely at how this happened.” “As a company, we know we got this wrong, and we are deeply sorry,” it said. “The costume is offensive and should never have been part of our assortment,” the statement continued, adding: “We know this is especially hurtful for our Black guests, team members, and partners.”

ECONOMY

US CONSUMER CONFIDENCE FALLS TO LOWEST LEVEL IN 7 MONTHS WITH GAS ABOVE $4

Americans’ confidence in the economy declined again this month as the ongoing conflict in Iran continued to push US gasoline prices above $4 per gallon. The Conference Board said Tuesday that its consumer confidence index dipped to 89.4 in August from 90.2 in July. That was the lowest level in seven months but was essentially within the same lukewarm range it has been in since the beginning of the year. In late 2024 and early 2025, readings were consistently above 100. Respondents’ views of their present situation improved, but their short-term outlook soured. Write-in responses to the board’s survey, collected from Aug. 3 to Aug. 16, were slightly more pessimistic this month. References to prices in general — and oil and gas prices specifically — remained elevated. Comments about war and geopolitics, food prices, trade, and jobs rose in August.

A law calls on the Cannabis Control Commission to conduct a review of regulations and testing protocols every two years.

Pot labs, growers urge CCC to update testing regulations

Say new rules needed to bolster quality control

By Katie Castellani
STATE HOUSE NEWS SERVICE

Cannabis businesses and others in the industry are urging regulators to update the state’s testing rules and make them more standardized and consistent with the latest data.

The state’s cannabis testing protocols and guidelines were last updated in 2021. Since then, other states like Colorado and New York have each updated their testing protocols multiple times, Ryan Dominguez, executive director of the Massachusetts Cannabis Coalition, said during a public hearing Tuesday.

A new law overhauling the state’s marijuana industry calls on the Cannabis Control Commission to conduct a review every two years of the regulations and protocols for the testing required before cannabis products can be legally sold here. Dominguez urged the CCC to go beyond the legislative mandate, which calls for a report from the CCC on its findings, and actually update regulations surrounding testing more frequently.

“We need real changes to the testing program. And if and when we get rescheduling, the available science, research and data will only increase and we need to keep up with that,” Dominguez told commissioners. Federal officials are currently considering whether to reschedule marijuana from a Schedule I substance to Schedule III under the Controlled Substances Act.

Megan Dobro, cofounder and CEO of SafeTiva Labs in Westfield, agreed, saying the state’s testing regulations are long overdue for an update. Dobro said “every lab is doing their own thing with little guidance” and some companies are rewarded for “cutting corners” when it comes to testing.

“We need rules that make scientific integrity the economically rational choice,” Dobro said. “We need clear standards for how testing is performed and interpreted. We need meaningful oversight when labs depart from those standards, we need to incentivize cultivators to submit representative samples, and we need to make sure consumers can trust the numbers on a label.”

Dawn Duncan, a board member of the Sun Grown Cannabis Alliance, said outdoor cannabis cultivation should be held to different standards than indoor growing to account for the fact that yeast, mold and bacteria are naturally found outside and some levels of those contaminants don’t mean the cannabis is unsafe.

“We realize when Massachusetts first developed its cannabis regulations, of course, it was understandably adopting an extremely cautious approach, but now we have many years of experience and evidence that weren’t available when those first rules were written,” Duncan said. “So we really do feel it’s appropriate to revisit those regulations and determine whether every testing requirement remains necessary, scientifically justified, and proportionate to actual risk.”

Several of those who testified also called on the CCC to establish more standardized testing methods. This includes creating uniform minimum standards for testing, sampling and quality control so “comparable products are tested in comparable ways,” said Ryan Picard with Analytics Labs.

Picard also called for more safeguards surrounding THC inflation.

“Consumers and businesses deserve results that reflect the product, not the laboratory or methodology selected to produce a preferred result,” Picard told commissioners.

On Aug. 13, the CCC released results of an audit of THC potency of cannabis flower products, finding most samples fell within an acceptable range. For the audit, the CCC determined that labels would be considered accurate if the testing showed THC potency between 75 percent and 125 percent of what’s listed on the label.

Thirteen of the 63 flower products sampled fell outside of that range. The CCC said it has placed noncompliant products on hold and that producers must take one of the following four actions: destroy the product; retest the product; recall and relabel the product with the audit result; or recall and repurpose the product, which requires new testing.

CCC officials say recreational consumers are usually willing to pay more for cannabis products with a higher THC concentration and those using medical marijuana rely on THC potency labels for dosing. The state’s cannabis regulations require labels to include a full cannabinoid profile and there are more specific requirements for certain products like extracts and tinctures.

“This shelf audit represents the continuing work of our internal testing task force, which we created to focus on testing issues as part of our mission to oversee a safe, equitable cannabis marketplace in Massachusetts,” CCC executive director Travis Ahern said in a press release. “The audit will also help us calibrate future audits as we move toward random testing for contaminants of concern, including pesticides, heavy metals, yeast and mold, and bacteria.”

The CCC has taken several other steps to put an emphasis on testing, including a new “Testing and Analysis” webpage and an ongoing internal testing task force.

Payton Shubrick, CEO and founder of 6 Brick’s, a dispensary in Springfield, joined others who testified in calling for labels to include more information including a full cannabinoid profile along with terpenes and THC levels.

“We should not be building an industry on one data point we have the least confidence in,” Shubrick said.

Offense’s turnaround difficult to fathom

By Alex Speier
GLOBE STAFF

The magnitude of the turnaround is shocking.

For three months, the Red Sox offense seemed not merely bad but hopeless. The power-deficient lineup ranked among the worst in baseball through 76 games, managing just 3.9 runs per game. Even an improvement to mediocrity seemed hard to imagine.

Yet over the last two months, the Sox have achieved a complete reversal. From June 25 through Sunday, their average of 5.4 runs per game ranked second in the big leagues. The club’s average of 6.0 runs per game in August leads baseball.

“You hope when it turns, it’s not just, ‘Oh, it turned for 10 days,’ and goes back,” said interim manager Chad Tracy. “Obviously, being that it’s gone on this long now, you can look at it and say, ‘All right, this is a discernible change.’”

That “discernible change” has come under a reconfigured coaching staff that was subject to considerable scrutiny when it was thrown together. The decision by chief baseball officer Craig Breslow to fire not only manager Alex Cora but also hitting coach Pete Fatse, assistant hitting coach Dillon Lawson, and hitting strategist Joe Cronin represented an in-season shakeup with little precedent.

Red Sox 7 MIAMI — In what has been a season of memorable moments for the Red Sox, Tuesday night’s victory against the Marlins was something else entirely.

The Sox took the lead in extra innings on a passed ball, lost it on a wild pitch, then finally won the game, 7-3, on a no-doubt grand slam by Jarren Duran in the 11th inning.

“A wild game, no doubt about it,” interim manager Chad Tracy said. “There was a lot of stuff going on, both sides. Back and forth and tied, and then it’s untied and tied again.

Patriots cornerback Christian Gonzalez returned to practice but didn’t provide an update on his negotiations. “The [front] office knows how I feel,” he said.

Wolf unable to offer news about Gonzalez’s status

By Nicole Yang
GLOBE STAFF

FOXBOROUGH — There were two main topics of discussion when Patriots executive vice president of player personnel Eliot Wolf met with the media Tuesday: cornerback Christian Gonzalez’s potential contract extension and the decision to trade wide receiver Kayshon Boutte.

On the status of negotiations with Gonzalez’s camp, Wolf said he had “nothing new to report.” He reiterated the organization’s desire to retain Gonzalez and intent to continue working with his representation in an effort to reach an agreement. Wolf acknowledged the Patriots have an understanding of what Gonzalez is seeking, but he declined to share details of the negotiations.

Gonzalez echoed that sentiment.

“The office knows how I feel,” he said Tuesday. “My team has made it known what I feel what I’m worth. But they feel what I’m worth. The right people know what I’m worth.”

Gonzalez acknowledged it’s “frustrating” the extension has yet to be finalized, but said he’s focused on preparing for the season.

Asked if he’s confident a deal will get done, Wolf would not definitively say yes. He also said he does not view Week 1 as an internal deadline to reach an agreement. Later, vice president of player personnel Ryan Cowden said the season opener approaching does not increase the sense of urgency.

“I’m confident we’re going to continue to work on it,” Wolf said. “We’re positive we’re making momentum.”

Preseason games are wasting our time

Preseason football has long represented the NFL’s version of an imitation luxury handbag hawked by a street vendor. It’s a dubiously priced replica of the genuine article that resembles the authentic, desirable product just enough to hold eye-of-the-beholder value.

But now the NFL preseason is a waste of time. More and more teams are mothballing frontline players for preseason games or putting them on the field for blink-and-you-missed-it cameos. It’s conventional for pre-season games to feel meaningless, but now with the rise of the joint practice they feel superfluous. Joint practices have emerged as the preseason preparation du jour. To quote Allen Iverson, a decorated high school quarterback, “We talking about practice. Not a game.”

It’s not the same.

The NFL has a preseason problem because the product is both risible and detestable. It’s a football farce that affects the real games because preseason protected species spend the first couple of weeks of the regular season acclimating to game speed. The current preseason game ethos is unsatisfying and unsustainable. Either the name players have to play more or the NFL has to cut down the preseason schedule like an undrafted rookie.

Patriots quarterback Drake Maye and the rest of the team’s presumed starters have remained in bubble wrap this preseason. They haven’t played a single snap entering Thursday’s preseason finale in Cleveland. Coach Mike Vrabel was noncommittal Monday when asked if the frontline players would log snaps.

A decade ago, it would’ve been unconscionable to think that one of the teams playing in the NFL’s regular-season kickoff game could enter that game with its players not having taken a game snap. Not anymore. The Seahawks, the Patriots’ opponents in the regular-season ribbon-cutter, haven’t played their top-shelf players, either. Rams

Practice field gives players the slip

ON FOOTBALL

FOXBOROUGH — The Patriots avoided significant injuries last week during their joint practices with the Eagles, and Mike Vrabel is trying his best to keep his starters healthy after decrying the team's depth after Saturday's preseason game.

Yet on what was supposed to be a quiet day of practice by themselves, the Patriots were thwarted Monday by an unexpected opponent who spoiled their injury luck — the Turf Monster.

On a bright, sunny morning, players were slipping left and right on the natural grass field. Offensive and defensive linemen had trouble maintaining their footing in one-on-one drills. Star receiver A.J. Brown had a scary looking slip in his own one-on-one with a corner-back, coming up gingerly but avoiding a disastrous noncontact injury. Running back TreVeyon Henderson wasn't so lucky. He slipped during a team drill and appeared to roll his right ankle, leaving practice with the head trainer. The extent of his injury was unclear.

When the day ended, I asked a Patriots employee, "Did it seem like guys were slipping a lot out there?" He responded, "It was probably the most noticeable aspect of practice."

Afterward, a couple of players agreed.

"Everybody was slipping, right?" running back Rhamondre Stevenson said. "I know we were all slipping. We need to find our footing down there."

Linebacker Christian Elliss was asked if it was like the type of game where he would have changed his cleat studs at halftime.

"That would've been ideal," he said. Coincidentally or not, the sloppy practice came on the same day the Patriots held practice for the first time on the lower field, the first time they had done so after four weeks of training camp on the upper fields. Until Monday, the lower field had only been used in practice by players rehabbing injuries. The Patriots last practiced on that field as a team during voluntary practices this spring.

Vrabel didn't explain in his pre-practice news conference why the team switched fields Monday, but a team spokesman said that the Patriots rotate practice fields throughout the season to maintain the grass on each. The team also said Henderson's injury Monday

However, the decision to move practice could prove costly if Henderson remains out for any length of time. Henderson's injury comes after Vrabel expressed displeasure at the Patriots' depth after Saturday's preseason game, saying, "I do not think we have a very deep team, so I think we have to make sure that we are preparing our football team and that we are doing everything that we can to keep our best players available."

And the slippery practice happened amid a contentious debate between the NFL and NFL Players Association over the use of artificial turf. Several stadiums (including Gillette Stadium) temporarily switched to natural grass for the World Cup, yet are switching back to artificial turf for the NFL season.

The players want all 30 stadiums to switch to natural grass on the basis that it is safer and easier on the body, but the Patriots' sloppy practice Monday arguably hurts their case since it came on natural grass.

The Patriots' practice was reminiscent of the 2024 Eagles-Packers game in Brazil, and the Eagles-Chiefs Super Bowl in Glendale, Ariz., in February 2023, both of which had players complaining about slippery footing. And last week in Buffalo, large chunks came out of the natural grass at the first preseason game at the new Highmark Stadium, with one player telling The Athletic, "The field is [expletive] right now."

Stevenson said the players just need to adjust better to the conditions.

"If that's the field conditions, we have to get used to it and know how to plant on our outside foot and stay on our feet," he said.

Eliot Wolf, the Patriots' executive vice president of player personnel, traded Kayshon Boutte to the Texans on Monday.

►PATRIOTS

If the parties are unable to reach an agreement by the start of the season, Wolf did not seem concerned about a potential drop in effort from Gonzalez. But Gonzalez would not commit to playing in Week 1, should that situation arise.

"I'm focused on today, this practice," Gonzalez said. "We'll see where we go from there."

Gonzalez's potential extension has loomed over the Patriots throughout the summer. Owner Robert Kraft made headlines on the opening day of training camp when he announced that the team had made an offer that would make Gonzalez the highest-paid cornerback in the NFL. Wolf noted that, even after Seahawks cornerback Devon Witherspoon signed his record-setting contract, that statement still holds true.

It's unclear which metrics (e.g. average annual value, total guaranteed money, guaranteed money at signing, etc.) the Patriots are using to make that statement.

"There's certain things that go into a contract, that my team knows that we want," Gonzalez said. "It kind of depends how you put it."

Asked how the potential extension for quarterback Drake Maye next offseason may affect Gonzalez's negotiations, Wolf said the team is mindful of both situations.

"It's about a cash budget and things like that," he said. "We're very aware of the timing of these things. We're cognizant of having a plan for that and working with Jonathan and Robert. We're thankful for their support, that they're open and willing for us to be able to sign great players."

As for the decision to trade Boutte, Wolf stressed the team's interest in acquiring safety Jaylen Reed — a player the front office had identified as a potential target in the 2025 draft.

"He ended up going before we could take him," Wolf said. "I followed his career last year in Houston and thought it was pretty remarkable that as a rookie who hadn't played much during the regular season, that they trusted him enough to play the majority of the playoff games."

Reed, taken in the sixth round at No. 187, played just 73 snaps on defense during the regular season, before starting two playoff games. Reed was on the field for 82 percent of the defense's snaps in the postseason. He will provide depth in the Patriots' safety room.

Wolf said the Patriots had multiple conversations with different teams but decided to pull the trigger once they had the opportunity to acquire Reed for a player the Texans wanted. He did not express any concern about dealing with another contender in the AFC.

According to Wolf, Boutte's desire to play elsewhere was not a factor in the team's decision.

"This was about the Patriots and doing what's best for our organization," he said.

By agreeing to a deal now, as opposed to waiting until, say, the trade deadline in November, Wolf noted that the safeties coaches will have time to get Reed up to speed. He also noted that the deal paves the way for bigger roles for other receivers (i.e. Kyle Williams).

"We have a deep receiver room," Wolf said. "As you look to the game-day roster, there's maybe some situations where the opportunities for certain players wouldn't be there. We felt like this was right time to do it."

Without Boutte, the Patriots are relying on a receiver corps of Williams, A.J. Brown, Romeo Doubs, Mack Hollins, DeMario Douglas, and Efton Chism.

"We feel really good about our receiver group," Wolf said. "We have guys that can play in multiple positions. They all really complement each other well. Obviously, when we acquired Romeo and A.J., something had to give."

FOXBOROUGH — According to a study released Tuesday, at least 25 percent of NFL players might expect to end up with chronic traumatic encephalopathy, based on an examination of hundreds of cases over a recent six-year period.

PATRIOTS NOTEBOOK

Several Patriots players said after practice while they were aware of the study—conducted by experts at Mass General Brigham, Boston University, and the Concussion & CTE Foundation — they were also cognizant of the dangers associated with playing football, citing how advances in helmet-related equipment technology, as well as medical protocols, have helped improve player safety over the last four seasons.

Specific to CTE, the rise of Guardian caps has helped make players feel safer. A soft-shell helmet cover, they were introduced into the league on a limited basis in 2020. In 2022, it was mandated that all linemen, tight ends, and linebackers wear them during early preseason practices. In 2024, the NFL approved their use during regular-season and postseason games as an optional choice for players.

Many players favor using the caps as a way to prevent head trauma. Several Patriots players have used them the last few seasons, including former safety Jabrill Peppers and current offensive lineman Jared Wilson.

Wilson decided to use a Guardian cap last year after sustaining his first concussion at the NFL level. He became the first player in NFL history to wear a Guardian cap in the Super Bowl at Super Bowl LX.

In addition, wide receiver Romeo Doubs, who signed this past season as a free agent, gained a measure of fame while wearing a customized Guardian cap during a throwback game with the Packers in 2024.

At the same time, other players who go without Guardian caps point to advances in helmet-based technology. Wide receiver DeMario Douglas, who has seen plenty of teammates wear Guardian caps over the years, said they aren't for him.

DANIELLE PARHIZKARAN/GLOBE STAFF

Patriots QB Drake Maye and wide receiver A.J. Brown continued to cement their bond in preseason camp.

"I feel like this how I grew up," said Douglas, motioning to his helmet and shoulder pads sitting on the grass nearby. "I feel like the Guardian cap is definitely good for those who hit and get hit constantly. I'm not hitting constantly. I probably get hit here and there, but it's not constantly like some of the linemen."

Douglas, who switched helmets a few years ago to the Schutt F7 — what he termed as a newer, safer model — said the technological advances made over the last few seasons have made his decision to go without a Guardian cap much easier.

"As they make new helmets, they take some helmets out. They upgrade. They take the old one out and make a new helmet that's better for safety," Douglas said. "That's what I did. I had an older model, and I was feeling it when I hit the ground. So then I switched to a newer model, and that felt way better and safer. Way better."

NFL is wasting our time with preseason games

coach Sean McVay habitually sits his frontline players during the preseason.

Since the NFL adopted a 17-game schedule in 2021, cutting the preseason from four games to three, the traditional routine has faded.

"Yes, it has changed, drastically," said first-year Cardinals coach Mike LaFleur. "[In] 2016 in Atlanta, [we] played four preseason games, and that third game for the league was like the mock game."

"You went out and you played a whole half of football with your starters, offense, defense, and then actually came out in the second half and at least [got] what it felt like to go back inside and make some adjustments, then get your body and mind right to play that third quarter. And that was just kind of the league."

"We always would play our guys for two games . . . The league has evolved with it. I still don't know if there is a right and wrong answer to it all"

Coaches are control freaks by nature. That dovetails perfectly with the rise of the joint practice. Joint practices create healthy competition between teams where coaches can script situations to measure players while metering the level of contact.

The Patriots hosted three joint practices — one with the Colts and two with the Eagles. Before practicing with Philadelphia, Vrabel said that his ones would be able to get 28 to 30 reps each day, far more than in a preseason game.

"You get a lot of intensity. But you see a lot of different looks, and teams are running a lot more stuff than they would run in the preseason in the game, putting it on film," Vrabel said.

Preseason game plans are usually as plain as a manila envelope. Joint practices represent a useful training simulation. Fans flock to them. But they aren't the same as playing in a game setting with unbridled and unapologetic football physicality.

Vrabel acknowledged that in an interview on WEEI, pointing out that some of the Maye completions cheered by fans and charted by media members during practices would result in the quarterback peeling himself off the turf in a game.

Vrabel projects ambivalence. Monday, he defended the value of preseason games, citing elements such as live tackling and pushing piles that can't be replicated.

Yet, following Saturday's victory over the Eagles, he lamented the team's depth and said, "We are doing everything that we can to keep our best players available."

Foxborough Faithful of a certain age remember the team's calamitous 1989 preseason finale when Hall of Famer Andre Tippett, defensive end Garin Veris, and cornerback Ronnie Lippett all suffered season-ending injuries.

Like everything in sports these days, there is an analytical impetus for joint practices replacing preseason games. You can't fight Big Data.

"At the owners' meetings, they talked about joint practices vs. playing in the preseason vs. not playing in the preseason," said LaFleur.

"If you get two joint practices in, that's the equivalent of playing in the two preseason games because it's an amped-up environment . . . For some reason, the data says if you end up having those joint practices you have less injury risk going into those first four weeks of the season."

This is the new normal. But it begs an existential question for preseason games: What's their purpose? That gets emphasized when the NFL inevitably moves to an 18-game, two-preseason-game schedule.

Certainly, preseason contests are valuable for players trying to make a roster and a name for themselves. But their raison d'être is no longer to prepare for the regular season. It's to generate revenue and audition for the bottom of the roster and practice squad. Fine. Just market it accurately as NFL JV football.

End the preseason pretense.

NFL NOTEBOOK

Jets choose Sanders to be kicker

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The Jets waived kicker Cade York, who was in a tightly contested competition with Jason Sanders, before the team's final practice of training camp Tuesday.

York was signed in March as a potential replacement for Nick Folk, who joined Atlanta in free agency after tying for the NFL lead with a 96.6 percent field-goal rate. But Jets special teams coordinator Chris Banjo announced Sanders, a long-time standout for Miami, won the job.

"We are going to be moving on from Cade," Banjo said. "He did a great job for us all throughout training camp and all throughout the evaluation process and in the games as well. But we feel really, really good about what Jason is and where we are with him right now, the experience he's kind of had in our division, kicking in our division.

Sanders was claimed off waivers from the Giants in June, pitting him against York throughout training camp. The two were up and down throughout the summer, including Monday when Sanders missed three of his five field-goal attempts at practice and York missed two of his five.

Sanders was 2 for 2 on field goals and made both of his extra points in two preseason games, while York was 2 for 3 on field goals — missing wide right from 59 yards on the final play of the first half at Pittsburgh last Friday — and made his lone extra-point try.

The Jets, who also had Younghoe Koo and Will Ferrin during the offseason, decided on Sanders as their kicker heading into the final preseason game against the Giants on Friday night.

York, 25, was a fourth-round pick of Cleveland in 2022 out of LSU and has a powerful but inconsistent leg. He has bounced around since his rookie season with the Browns, spending time with the Titans, Giants, Browns again, Commanders, Bengals, and Saints before landing with the Jets.

Seahawks lose pair

The Seahawks have placed safety Bud Clark and offensive lineman Mason Richman on injured reserve because of injuries they suffered in a pre-season loss at Tennessee.

Clark, a second-round draft pick this year out of TCU, broke his ankle on Seattle's first defensive play Sunday and was carted off the field with his leg in an air cast.

Richman injured his right leg on Seattle's opening drive. Following the game, coach Mike Macdonald called it a "major injury, a long-term injury" without revealing details.

Giants' Austin carted off

Giants wide receiver Calvin Austin was carted off the field during a training camp practice after appearing to injure his right knee. Austin, 27, was in his first camp with the Giants after signing a $1.5 million contract for this season. Later, the Giants traded offensive lineman Josh Ezeudu to the Chiefs for a seventh-round pick in the 2028 draft, according to a person familiar with the deal. It is the second time in the past week New York picked up an asset for a depth lineman . . . The Commanders released Will Harris, ending the veteran safety's tenure in Washington after just one season. Harris, 30, signed a two-year, $8 million contract in March 2025. He played just nine games for the Commanders last season while missing time because of a fractured fibula, finishing with 38 tackles, one sack, one forced fumble and no interceptions. . . Vikings wide receiver Jeshaun Jones was issued a three-game suspension by the NFL for violating the league's substances of abuse policy. The NFL's announcement of the punishment did not disclose the nature of the violation. Jones, 26, spent each of the past two years on Minnesota's practice squad, before being promoted to the active roster and appearing in the final game of the 2025 season . . . Saints running back Ty Chandler and tight end Moliki Matavao were placed on season-ending injured reserve with knee injuries that occurred during a 34-0 loss at the Rams on Saturday. A day earlier, the Saints placed defensive back Rejzohn Wright on injured reserve.

Weekend return on players' minds

Story, Anthony progressing enough to have hopes of joining team in New York

By Alex Speier

WORCESTER — The Red Sox are nearing a line change.

Trevor Story, Roman Anthony, and Isiah Kiner-Falefa were all at Polar Park with Triple-A Worcester on Tuesday, continuing rehab assignments that now have them within reach of returns to the big leagues for the first time in months.

Story, who has been sidelined since mid-May while recovering from a sports hernia that required surgery, expressed confidence he'd rejoin the Red Sox by Friday in New York. Though his 0-for-4 night left him 4 for 25 (.160) with seven strikeouts and one walk in seven rehab games, Story feels his timing and stamina are at a point where a return to the big leagues is realistic.

"Overall, feeling really good," said Story, who has rehabbed with the WooSox for 10 days. "I'm on [time with] the barrel, just a touch off [on squaring pitches]. [It's] to be expected. I think more than the results, it's more about how I'm feeling and kind of dictating the at-bat. And I'm in a good spot there. So, next day or two, hit some barrels and feel good about [returning]."

Anthony, who has been out since suffering a partially torn ligament in his right ring finger May 4, crushed a homer (107-miles-per-hour exit velocity against a 90-m.p.h. meatball of a sinker) in a 2-for-4 night Tuesday, his first game with the WooSox after spending last week with Double-A Portland.

After he played all nine innings in the outfield Tuesday, Anthony said he expects to do the same with the WooSox on Wednesday, after which he and the team will decide on the next step in his rehab.

Anthony is 5 for 15 with two homers, a double, three walks, and six strikeouts during his rehab assignment. He said he "absolutely" feels like a return to the big leagues is in reach.

"I think last week was more of just kind of feeling it out, getting back to just playing baseball and getting the body in shape," said Anthony. "I'm to a point now where, week two, I'm looking forward to getting back into a big league game as soon as possible."

Does he believe that he might be able to return to the Red Sox by the weekend in New York?

"Yeah," said Anthony. "I'm taking it super day by day. There's no plan [for when he'll return]. There's no, 'You've got to be ready by this time.' That's been great. I think for me, it's about just taking it one pitch at a time, and we'll reassess how I feel after tonight. And same thing goes for tomorrow. But there's no plan. There's no flight that's booked or anything like that. It's all about just how I respond and how I feel."

It was only his second home run in 112 at-bats against a lefthanded pitcher this season.

"Just trying to get a good pitch to hit," Duran said. "It was stressful, to be honest. I feel like this is just the character that we've shown all year."

Alec Gamboa, the sixth Red Sox pitcher, recorded four outs for the victory.

At 73-59, the Sox are a season-high 14 games over .500. They have won five straight, seven of eight, and nine of 11, and now trail the Yankees by 1½ games for the top wild-card spot in the American League.

The Sox can sweep the series Wednesday night with Sonny Gray facing righthander Ryan Gosto. Then comes a four-game showdown series in New York.

Until the extra-inning drama, it was the Gasper Show.

He hit his first home run in the second inning off Tyler Phillips, driving a sinker 394 feet to right-center field. The ball landed on a berm of artificial grass to the delight of the many Sox fans in the crowd of 16,821 at loanDepot park.

That run looked like it might hold up for a bit as Red Sox starter Payton Tolle carried a no-hitter into the fifth inning. But Xavier Edwards led off with a ground-rule double to right field.

Edwards was thrown out trying to advance to third on a ground ball up the middle by Leo Jiménez. Griffin Conine singled and Esteury Ruiz walked to load the bases.

No. 9 hitter Brian Navarreto fouled off four two-strike pitches before delivering a game-tying sacrifice fly to center field. Tolle got ahead 0 and 2 but could not put away the light-hitting backup catcher.

Gasper homered in the sixth inning, this time to dead center field off Tyler Zuber. Gasper has reached base eight consecutive times in the series with four hits and four walks to go along with three RBIs and two runs.

Jarren Duran was 0 for 4 before his winning grand slam in the 11th inning.

tom of the inning with a game-tying 403-foot shot off Tolle to left that soared into the bleachers.

The extra innings were a mess.

Connor Wong was at third with one out in the 10th when the pitch from Calvin Faucher ticked off the glove of Navarreto and hit the facemask of umpire David Rackley. The ball went to the backstop and Wong scored easily.

Then the Sox were victim of a similar play in the bottom of the inning.

With two outs, Navarreto scored from third base on a wild pitch from rookie Wyatt Olds as Javier Sanoja struck out swinging. The curveball was well inside and low to Sanoja and got past Wong.

"It was really nasty," Wong said. "It was a tough pitch to catch."

The Sox are 63-42 under Tracy. He's come to expect this group of players will find a way to win games that veer off in different directions.

"They've been doing that for a while now. It's almost become — at least for them, for us — almost an expectation.

"Regardless of what happens, if something crazy goes against us and it's demoralizing, they're just going to keep fighting. I applaud them for that. I think that's just kind of the character of the team now, and it's what we expect."

While Story and Anthony are working to return to everyday roles, Kiner-Falefa will return to a part-time/bench role in the big leagues. As such, Kiner-Falefa (2 for 16 with six strikeouts and four walks in five rehab games) said he'd like another full week with the WooSox in order to get as many at-bats as possible before returning to the big leagues. He's targeting a return when rosters expand Sept. 1.

"I just don't want to rush. I know to win the World Series, I'm going to have to be the best version of myself, [or] if not the best version, close to it. I'm looking at the the big picture, and I think the best thing for me is to get extra games," said Kiner-Falefa, who noted encouragement that his bat speed has been the same in his return from a stress reaction in his left ulna bone as it was before his late-June injury. "Sept. 1 would be more ideal for me [as a return date] . . . You'll get the better version of me."

All three expressed atypical patience with their rehab process — a reflection of the tremendous performance of the big league team with fill-ins such as Andruw Monasterio, Nick Sogard, and Mickey Gasper.

"Those guys have played really well, and did their job at a really high level," said Story. "It's given us a little bit of a cushion too, if I don't feel 100 percent sharp, it's OK to take a couple extra and really make sure that the body feels good. And I feel like I owe it to the team, owe it to myself, everybody involved with this thing to come back and be the best version of myself."

Alvarez, Astros too much for Yankees

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Yordan Alvarez went 3 for 5 and lined a go-ahead triple in the eighth inning off Brent Headrick as the visiting Astros beat the Yankees, 9-7, on Tuesday night.

Yainer Diaz hit a pair of solo homers, including a tying shot to the short porch in right off Headrick's fast-ball to start the eighth. After Jeremy Pena singled, Alvarez ripped a sinker to the warning track in right-center for a 7-6 lead.

Alvarez increased his major league-leading batting average to .323.

Daulton Varsho had two RBI singles for the Astros, who won for the sixth time in 15 games after owner Jim Crane said manager Joe Espada will finish the season.

Isaac Paredes added an RBI single off Headrick (7-3), who has allowed five homers in 68 appearances. Headrick is second in the big leagues in appearances to Toronto lefty Mason Fluharty and permitted a run for only the 12th time.

RED SOX NOTEBOOK

Spot in lineup no given for returnees

By Peter Abraham
GLOBE STAFF

MIAMI — As Roman Anthony, Isiah Kiner-Falefa, and Trevor Story get closer to coming off the injured list, interim manager Chad Tracy made it clear that no player is guaranteed a spot in the lineup given how well the Red Sox have performed in their absence.

“I don’t foresee a scenario where we get new players here, and I’m just going to not play the guys [who have been playing],” Tracy said Tuesday before before a 7-3, 11-inning victory against the Marlins.

“We’re getting to the point of the season where we have a month left. It’s about trying to win every single game. What gives us the best chance that night’s game to do that? This is not necessarily the point of the season where it’s like we’re going to work through it. We’ve got to go out there and try to win the game — and that’s with whoever’s available that night to start.”

Andrew Monasterio has filled in ably at shortstop and been an above-average hitter.

Miami memories

For Wilyer Abreu, Willson Contreras, and Ranger Suarez, returning to loanDepot park this week generated some smiles. It was here where Venezuela beat the United States, 3-2, on March 17 to win the World Baseball Classic.

“A great day for our country,” Suarez said.

Abreu hit a solo homer in that game in front of a noisy sellout crowd of 35,382. He had an .845 OPS and drove in seven runs over seven games in the tournament.

Suarez started twice, beating the Netherlands in pool play before being hit hard by Japan in the quarterfinals, a game his teammates rallied to win.

Contreras played only four games and had 13 plate appearances. Manager Omar Lopez preferred Luis Arraez at first base and Eugenio Suarez as the designated hitter.

“I’ll always remember winning the WBC,” Abreu said. “But it feels different coming here for a major league game.”

Understandably so. The Red Sox-Marlins game drew only 16,247 on Monday night, which may or may not have counted the dogs who were there for the Bark in the Park promotion. Most of the two-legged fans were cheering for the Red Sox.

For Abreu, winning the WBC has him wondering what it would be like to win the World Series.

“It would be amazing,” he said. “To do both of those things in one season, it’s hard to imagine. But we have to focus day by day and stay in the present before we think about the World Series.”

Rutschman gets a day

Adley Rutschman hyper-extended his right elbow taking a swing Monday night and was out of the lineup. He had a compression sleeve on the joint and is day to day . . . Caleb Durbin was scheduled for his first day off since Aug. 9 and second since June 17, but he was called on in the ninth. His left little finger remains pointed sideways, though he has been able to tape it up and play . . . Tanner Houck is scheduled to face hitters Friday, which would be the fourth time for that. The right-hander, who is recovering from Tommy John surgery, is moving toward a rehab assignment. Right-hander Johan Oviedo, out all year with an elbow strain, was recently cleared to face hitters . . . Garrett Crochet had a day of “high intent” throwing in Boston, according to Tracy. The lefty is trying to return from shoulder inflammation . . .

Curtis Mead, who broke his left wrist in his first game for the Sox on July 27, is out of a hard cast and using a splint. Tracy said he has started mobility exercises. It’s a long shot, but Mead could conceivably return this season.

Mariners’ Cal Raleigh homered in his first at-bat against the visiting Phillies and tied a Mariners’ record with homers in four consecutive at-bats. The switch-hitting catcher hit three homers and walked in a 9-2 win Monday . . . Francisco Lindor made a diving catch at shortstop with the bases loaded in the ninth and scored the winning run on a throwing error in the 10th to lead the host Mets past the Brewers, 3-2. Lindor’s homer was his 154th for New York, tying Dave Kingman for sixth on the franchise list . . .

Oswaldo Pirela, a Padres minor league coaching coordinator who was detained by federal immigration officers in Texas, has been released on bond, his family said. US Immigration and Customs Enforcement detained Pirela at the El Paso International Airport during a work trip Aug. 16. The Padres have a minor league team in the city, the El Paso Chihuahuas . . . Giants lefty Carson Whisenhunt suffered a torn ulnar collateral ligament in his pitching elbow and is likely to need surgery . . . The Cardinals put shortstop Masyn Winn , the reigning NL Glove winner, on the 10-day injured list with a broken left thumb.

Sox’ offensive turnaround truly shocking one month on the big league staff, remained, joined by three minor league coaches with no prior big league experience: Triple-A hitting coach Collin Hertzler, Single-A hitting coach Nelson Paulino, and rookie level hitting coach Jack Simonetty. Players were uncertain what to make of the overhaul.

“It wasn’t easy to change the coaching staff,” said first baseman Willson Contreras. “I was kind of shocked at first. I was like, ‘How’s this gonna work?’ Thankfully, these guys are doing a great job.”

Offensive improvement didn’t happen instantly. The team’s offensive approach seemed to get worse before it got better, with the Sox enduring a dip in runs per game for two months under Tracy and the new staff.

The incoming group was well aware (as its predecessors had been) that the offense had struggled with swing decisions — chasing too many pitches out of the strike zone, swinging at pitchers’ pitches on the edges early in counts, remaining passive on the best pitches to drive. Still, the new staff didn’t want to bust into the clubhouse like the Kool-Aid Man and demand an overhauled approach.

“Put yourself in our shoes. You’re not going to come in and say, ‘We’re changing A, B, C, D, and E,’ when you haven’t even watched a game live in-person,” said Tracy. “This isn’t something that just changes overnight. Let’s observe . . . Let’s let this play out.”

During a period of observation and relationship-building, data underscored the need to hone swing decisions. Gradually, the new coaches more regularly filtered discussions of swing decisions into conversations with players.

Daily hitters meetings started including increasingly detailed breakdowns about swing decisions in the various hitting regions — the heart of the zone, where damage is most likely and thus an area of focus before two strikes; the shadow zone, on the edges of the plate, which hitters defend with two strikes; the chase zone on pitches clearly off the plate; and waste pitches that are off the plate by at least a foot.

“One of the highest-leverage things was shifting some of the messaging and some of the training, and just highlighting the importance of swinging at the right pitches,” said Sotero-pulos.

The new staff compared the Sox offense with the league average in swing decisions in those regions, while explaining how narrowing the zone could affect the quality of the contact. Day-after reviews of swing decisions from games became a staple. Players understood what was being preached.

“[The coaches] obviously have the things they prioritize and that we want to prioritize as an offense,” said third baseman Caleb Durbin. “We look at those numbers daily.”

Pregame training was increasingly dedicated to pitch recognition and honing swing decisions. The language and values espoused by coaches became more prominent in the way players talked with each other.

Eventually, the lineup — at a time when Trevor Story and Marcelo Mayer, two of the more aggressive hitters on the team in the early season, were sidelined by injuries — started making meaningful gains.

Through three months, the Sox had ranked among the least aggressive in baseball on pitches in the heart of the zone and among the most aggressive on chase and waste pitches. But the dials turned in late June.

In August, the Sox are close to league average on aggressiveness on the heart-of-the-zone pitches that can be driven, while posting above-average rates on chase- and waste-zone pitches. That tightened approach is the foundation of the team’s offensive surge.

“What that does is a few things: We’re walking more. The strikeout rate has gone down a little bit. And the contact quality is up,” said Sotero-pulos.

“The team is doing a great job laying off pitches and finding the pitches that we can do damage on,” agreed Contreras. “That’s been the difference between before and after.”

With a more disciplined approach, the Sox lineup has gone from one with numerous leaks to a formidable group without easy landing spots for opposing pitchers. The offense, in turn, has gone from a drag to an accelerator.

“The players were awesome as far as, ‘What do we need to do better?’ ” said Tracy. “It’s not we need more hits or we need to walk more. Those are results. It’s, ‘How do you get there?’ Being more decisive in our swing decision would help. And over time, pounding that message, the guys have done an amazing job.”

Of the trade and sleepless nights

Stevens replays what went into sending Brown to the 76ers, and the aftermath

By Avery Hill
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

WEST BARNSTABLE — It didn’t take long for Celtics president of basketball operations Brad Stevens to address the elephant in the room.

“I’ve been called a lot of things this summer,” Stevens joked when moderator Graham Honaker asked how to refer to him.

The comment kicked off Stevens’s appearance Tuesday afternoon at Cape Cod Community College for the final edition of the 2026 Cape Cod Speaker Series. The conversation focused on Stevens’s leadership and growth — but there was no escaping talk about Jaylen Brown, who was traded for Paul George and draft picks last month.

Given the location, that’s expected.

Celtic green sprinkled across the packed theatre. For the series’ raffle, the award was a silver, signed basketball. Elders dominated the crowd, but if Stevens glanced at the edge of the front row, he’d see kids donning Jayson Tatum and Payton Pritchard jerseys — there were no Brown jerseys.

Talks of the stunning move brought light to a room clearly expecting him to break the ice at some point. Even Stevens knew it’d come, flashing a smirk any time a question was asked that could relate to the trade.

Honaker, who is Butler University’s associate athletic director for development, was sure to pick Stevens’s brain on it, even if not directly. He asked how Stevens, who is the Celtics’ president of basketball operations, can trust his instincts when making unpopular decisions.

“Well, obviously, I’m sure a lot of people immediately got to Jaylen Brown, right, or immediately go to [Marcus Smart] a couple years ago, and that’s a really hard part of the job,” Stevens said. “And, you, again, try to be as upfront and honest as you can, but there are a lot of factors when you end up making a decision and you’re leaning on a lot of people, leaning on a lot of information.”

Stevens added it’s important in leadership roles to understand that decisions like that will be painful.

“I get a lot of emails and a lot of people that ask about wanting to be a GM,” Stevens said. “I’m like, ‘I wish you would’ve been around last summer when we basically had to trade Jrue Holiday.’ That’s like brutal. Or we go through this long arduous process and ultimately decide to trade Jaylen, whose numbers will likely go up in the rafters in Boston. Not fun.”

While Stevens was more detailed and basketball-focused in the first go-around, Stevens’s comments weren’t much different than from his July 6 news conference.

Though Brown wasn’t specifically mentioned Tuesday, Stevens — a noted “numbers guy” — even discussed his mind-set on analytics, which

WNBA NOTEBOOK

Valkyries a title threat in second season

By Julian Benbow
GLOBE STAFF

A year ago, the Valkyries’ success was an anomaly. No expansion team had reached the WNBA playoffs in its inaugural season until they set the bar last season.

This season, Golden State is more successful — and more anomalous — not only because it has catapulted from expansion upstart to championship threat, but because of the way it has won games all season.

The Valkyries are in second place after a milestone win Monday against the Lynx. Up to that point, Minnesota was the only team Golden State hadn’t found a way to beat in its young history.

The Valkyries finally did to Minnesota what they’ve done to virtually every other team this season, clamping down so tightly on defense that opponents can’t comfortably perform ordinary tasks.

Golden State held Minnesota to a season-low 66 points.

“Keeping that team to 66, that’s a very, very talented team,” Golden State coach Natalie Nakase told reporters. “They’re No. 1 for a reason. Really proud to keep them to 66.”

Minnesota was another notch on the belt for Golden State’s defense.

Four teams — the Fever, Lynx, Mystics, and Liberty — have had their worst scoring nights of the season against the Valkyries.

More than that, in only four of 37 games has an opponent reached its season scoring average against Golden State: the Aces twice, the Mercury, and the Mystics.

In a season in which offensive ratings are at an all-time high — six of the 10 highest team offensive ratings ever — the Valkyries are holding opponents to 76.3 points per game and own the league’s best defensive rating.

“This is a huge leap for us,” Nakase said. “Again, trying to prepare to be at our best for the playoffs.”

Musical chairs month

With a month left in the season, the playoff field is essentially set. But matchups could still be up in the air on the final day of the regular season.

Going into Tuesday’s games, just 4½ games separated the second-seeded Valkyries and the eighth-seeded Wings.

Golden State’s win at Minnesota was a breakthrough — its first against the Lynx — but it still has work to do to sew up the second seed.

With seven games left, the Valkyries control their destiny. Six wins, and the second seed is theirs. But after losing all three games in their season series against the Aces, they do not control the tiebreaker against the team directly behind them in the standings.

Matchups will matter because every team has a rival it has struggled against this season.

The Dream are 0-3 against the Valkyries. The Wings are 0-3 against the Dream, 0-3 against the Valkyries, and 0-4 against the Lynx.

The Valkyries are 0-3 against the Aces. The Fever lost their only matchup so far with the Lynx. The Aces are 1-2 against the Wings, Fever, Lynx, and Liberty.

many speculated became a factor in to the decision to move the five-time All-Star.

“Data is an important part of learning about what you’re capable of, and learning about your team, but it is a part of it. Not all of it,” Stevens said.

“I do think that there’s a lot of room for eyes, feel, preparing for curveballs so you’re ready for that in any scenario.”

Stevens also spoke about things like growing up in Indiana, his time coaching at Butler, and learning from former Celtics executive Danny Ainge.

After the first wave, questions regarding Brown seemed to dissipate. That was until the crowd got its turn.

Stevens had talked about learning to sell Prozac, an antidepressant, during his time at Eli Lilly and Company — the job he quit to pursue coaching — so a fan asked him to use his experience to sell Prozac to Celtics fans.

“Give him that mic to drop it,” Stevens said. “That’s a good question. I can’t say that I slept well, or have slept well, but those are the hard decisions sometimes that come with the gig.”

Avery Hill can be reached at avery.hill@globe.com.

The Liberty are 0-2 against the Valkyries and 1-2 against the Wings and Fire. The Mystics are 1-2 against the Valkyries, Aces, Lynx, and Liberty.

Who’s hooping?

Kelsey Mitchell, Fever: Mitchell has made 20-point nights look like the norm for the past two months, when they are anything but. Her run of 23 consecutive 20-point games is the longest in WNBA history by far. The closest anyone has come is A’ja Wilson, who had 15 straight in 2024. Before that, Diana Taurasi had 12 in 2006.

Caitlin Clark, Fever: The scary part is that the other half of Indiana’s backcourt is just as dangerous. Clark knocked down a career-high eight 3-pointers and scored 37 points Sunday in a win over Chicago. The scoring binge was one thing, but the volume and efficiency were just as impressive: Clark shot 8 of 12 from beyond the arc.

Valkyries (26-11) vs. Liberty (23-15), Thursday, 8 p.m.: In the middle of a five-game road trip, Golden State will face Connecticut on Wednesday, then head to Brooklyn to play the Liberty the next day. The Valkyries have had New York’s number twice this season, holding the Liberty to 70 points in May and 67 points in June.

Lynx (31-8) vs. Dream (25-13), Sunday, 3 p.m.: Along with the Liberty, Fever, and Sun, the Dream are one of the few teams left with a chance to win a season series against the Lynx. Minnesota will have to solve Allisha Gray, who averaged 22.5 points in their first two meetings.

SEC bans football, hoop players with pro contracts

The Southeastern Conference passed a rule Tuesday banning players who have been drafted by NFL, NBA, or WNBA teams or listed on rosters in those leagues, joining the Big Ten in taking a strong stand against this month’s unexpected surge of pro players trying to return to college. The SEC’s rule differs from the one adopted by the Big Ten, which only included football in its decision released earlier in the day. Combined, it leaves little doubt about where the nation’s two biggest conferences stand in the wake of court orders that were allowing players who had been on pro rosters, then released, to return back to college. It puts LSU on notice. This week, Tigers coach Lane Kiffin added Dae’Quan Wright and Zxavian Harris, a pair of undrafted players out of Mississippi who had tryouts in the NFL over the summer, but were released by their teams during training camp. The rule, which also applies to players signed by the NBA G League, will impact RJ Luis Jr., who Monday won a court ruling that allowed him to sign with Will Wade’s basketball program at LSU despite having briefly been under contract with the Jazz and Celtics of the NBA.

Baseball to use ABS system

The Automated Ball/Strike system has been approved for use next season in all divisions of college baseball, the NCAA announced. The Division 1 Baseball Oversight Committee and the Division 2 and Division 3 Playing Rules Oversight Panel recently voted to give teams the option, when available, of implementing a system to challenge called balls and strikes in regular-season and post-season games.

BASKETBALL

Edwards leads Sun past Sky

Aaliyah Edwards scored a career-high 26 points to go with 10 rebounds and Diamond Miller added 21 points as the Connecticut Sun beat the visiting Chicago Sky, 87-81. Kennedy Burke added 19 points for Connecticut. Edwards was 11 of 16 from the field in 26 minutes and topped her previous best of 24 points. Earlier in the day, Sky owner Michael Alter said the team has banned Enes Kanter Freedom from their home games after the former NBA center was ejected from Sunday’s loss to the Indiana Fever.

Methuen’s Niang joins Warriors

Free agent forward Georges Niang has signed a one-year contract with the Warriors for the league minimum of $3.9 million. The 33-year-old veteran was sidelined last season with both the Jazz and Grizzlies recovering from a left foot injury. Niang appeared in 79 games during 2024-25 for the Hawks and Cavaliers, averaging 9.9 points, 3.4 rebounds, and 1.4 assists over 21.5 minutes. He has played 544 games over nine NBA seasons with the Hawks, Cavaliers, 76ers, Jazz, and Pacers. The Methuen native was with the Celtics briefly last summer, coming over from the Hawks as part of a three-team trade that sent Kristaps Porzingis to Atlanta before being flipped to Utah.

TENNIS

Williams/Alcaraz KO’d in quarters

Serena Williams getting back on the court at the US Open after a four-year absence and Carlos Alcaraz returning to competitive tennis after being out the past four months with injury brought cheers and nostalgia to the Grand Slam tournament. The celebration was short-lived. After winning their debut playing together, Williams and Alcaraz got knocked out in the mixed doubles quarterfinals by Belinda Bencic and Flavio Cobolli, 5-4 (4), 4-1. Williams and Alcaraz defeated Erin Routliffe and Lloyd Glasspool, 5-3, 4-1, earlier in the day. The champions spent $1 million in the second year of the mixed doubles format that is meant to attract top players. Joining Bencic and Cobolli in the semifinals were Elina Svitolina and Gael Monfils; Mirra Andreeva and Andrey Rublev; and Karolina Muchova and Jakub Mensik.

Medfield begins bid for Divison 3 repeat

By Henry Dinh-Price
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

MEDFIELD — Day 2 of girls' soccer tryouts at Medfield High finished with a drill coach Melinda Lohan calls "The Gauntlet."

It consists of 15 sprints to the 20-yard line and back, five to the 35-yard line and back, three to the 50-yard line and back, and a final full-field dash.

As 47 players hustled back and forth, Lohan yelled out, "This is the difference in a 1-0 game. Let's go!"

Players continually motivated each other throughout the drill, picking up tired teammates. "We got it, guys!" and "You can do it!" rang out from the end zone between sprints.

"I feel like people feed off each other's energy," said junior midfielder Lyla Manning. "If you're doing something positive and working hard, other people want to be just like that."

When every player in the program completed the drill, Lohan told her players, "Not many programs are working this hard in the preseason."

As much as those sprints were about stamina, Lohan wanted to see how her group communicates when facing adversity.

"When it comes down to it, it's what they do on the field and how they talk to each other on the field that matters," Lohan said. "That unification now is going to carry us further in the season."

It marks the start of a new campaign for a Medfield team seeking to repeat as Division 3 champions.

The Warriors graduated 10 seniors from last year's 22-1 squad that defeated Nipmuc, 1-0, in the title game. But with talented holdovers, Medfield has the necessary pieces to repeat.

"We lost a lot of really good players," said junior forward Devon Weafer. "But we still have a whole lot of really good players too."

Senior forward Sidney Heavey, a Globe Athlete of the Year and Central Florida commit who had 24 goals with 14 assists last fall, returns as one of the state's best players. In the state final, she constantly drew fouls and endless attention from Nipmuc's defenders and set up Weafer for the lone goal. Heavey's mother, Kristine Lilly, is soccer's all-time leader in international caps, with 354 appearances for the United States.

"She's extremely helpful," Heavey said of her mother. "Just her attitude, I've picked up on as I've grown up, just working harder and harder for everything that you want to achieve."

In addition to Heavey, senior co-captain midfielder Audrey Grandinetti (Quinnipiac), Manning (Lehigh), and Weafer (Florida), who scored 28 goals last season, are all headed for the Division 1 ranks.

Since the end of last season, all four have stayed busy on their club teams, all the while awaiting a reunion with the Warriors.

"We haven't been playing with each other all spring season, so it's fun to play with my best friends again," Heavey said.

Lohan is still figuring out who will be completing the varsity roster, noting that the program's depth will make those decisions difficult.

"We've got genuinely two varsity teams sitting on this field right now," Lohan said. "We're so fortunate, and that's what makes our program really challenging."

Entering her fourth season as head coach, Lohan, a two-time Globe Coach of the Year, sports a 58-6-4 record, taking Medfield to the Division 3 semifinals in 2023 and the final in 2024 before winning the championship last November.

"It felt like the perfect progression," she said. "But to know now that we've accomplished it with girls who are on this team is even more motivating to go back, because to taste anything other than victory, like to go home in tears, is something that I know those seniors will not allow."

Medfield players shared that sentiment. They're nowhere near satisfied after last season.

"We have so much more to prove this year," said Grandinetti. "So we're just going to work that much harder."

Playoff changes coming in '28

Finale switching to match play

ASSOCIATED PRESS

The PGA Tour is reshaping its postseason for 2028 by ending the year with a Tour Championship played over two weeks at different golf courses involving match play.

PGA Tour CEO Brian Rolapp announced the changes Tuesday before the Tour Championship, which has been 72 holes of stroke play for the top 30 players since it began in 1987.

Under the current format, whoever wins the tournament is declared the FedEx Cup champion and earns $10 million from the $40 million purse.

Starting in 2028, the BMW Championship — to be held that year at Olympia Fields near Chicago — will be for the leading 90 players on the points list. Points from the season continue, and the No. 1 player will be the season champion with bonus money paid out accordingly.

The top 32 after the BMW Championship will be broken into eight groups of four-player pools for the first week of the Tour Championship. The leading two players from each pool advance to the final week, which will be match play over four days. Players eliminated early will play through Sunday to determine final positions.

"This sets the stage for a reimagined Tour Championship, a separate, standalone competition that will emerge as one of the most difficult tournaments to qualify for and win," Rolapp said. "It's match play over two weeks, an opportunity to make this an extended moment that commands the attention of golf and sports fans."

Key details, such as where the final two weeks will be played and how much money will be at stake, have not been announced.

Path back from LIV

Rolapp offered a path back to a small number of LIV Golf players at the start of the year with a tight deadline to accept it and a warning that "once the door closes, there is no promise that this path will be available again."

It's a hot topic now that the LIV Golf League is done with its shortened season. The speculation is just starting to ramp up on which players might be wanting back, Jon Rahm and Bryson DeChambeau chief among them.

Brooks Koepka mutually ended his contract with LIV Golf when he left at the end of 2025, and that would be a starting point now.

"Anyone who's interested in coming to the PGA Tour needs to demonstrate that they are relieved of their contractual commitments or any tail obligations they might have in that legacy model," Rolapp said. "Brooks certainly did that, and until then, we weren't really able to consider anything seriously. I would say the same thing here."

Divots

LeBron James's passion for golf now includes a partnership with the PGA Tour that will bring a two-day tournament to Firestone Country Club in his hometown of Akron, Ohio, on July 6-7 to connect youth with aspiring professionals . . . Getting to the Tour Championship means Adam Scott's streak playing in the majors, assuming he stays healthy, will reach at least 106 in a row. He's at 101. He is assured of all four majors next year and the Masters (past champion) in 2028 . . . The Solheim Cup between the United States and Europe will feature only 13 of the top 50 players in the women's world ranking.

CARROLL, Robert Mackin
“Bobby” Jr.

Beloved brother, fun-loving uncle, and wicked-funny person, Robert Mackin “Bobby” Carroll, Jr., passed away on August 19, 2026, in Dorchester, Massachusetts. He was 75 years old.

Bobby was born on June 24, 1951, in Bethesda, Maryland, the son of Captain Robert Mackin Carroll and Dorothy Mulhern Carroll. He was the fourth of five children. His father’s naval career took the family from Hawaii to Virginia Beach to England, before the Carrolls finally settled in Jamaica Plain, where Bobby attended the Manning School, Nazareth, Saint Sebastian’s and ultimately, graduated from Wilbraham Academy.

Bobby could talk to anyone and had a story about everything. He moved to Los Angeles as a young man, where he charmed the stars as a limousine driver, mastered the art of bartending, and developed his signature way of saying “Santa Monica.” He eventually opened his own bar, naming it the Moss Hill Grill, in honor of the Jamaica Plain street where he grew up. Bobby then took his talents back to Boston and became a local institution behind the bar at the Rattlesnake on Boylston Street, slinging strong drinks, telling tall tales and eventually earning the prestigious honor of Boston Magazine’s “Bartender of the Year.” You never forgot meeting Bobby, whether you spent an hour on one of his stools or a few minutes in the back of his cab.

Bobby had an irrepressible sense of humor and encyclopedic knowledge of Boston sports. He could tell you the batting average of any Red Sox player for the last 40 years and make his many nieces, nephews and sixteen great-nieces and nephews laugh with a silly joke or a mischievous trick. He was the life of every party and his many friends will be telling their own stories about him for the rest of their lives. He never took himself too seriously, and he never surrendered his unique perspective on the world.

Bobby is survived by his sisters, Susan Carroll Lemkau and Janet Carroll Donelan; his brothers, Frederick Carroll and Richard Carroll; their wives, Elizabeth and Brigitte Carroll; the rest of his devoted family and half a pack of Marlboro Red 100s. He will be dearly missed and impossible to forget.

Family and friends are invited to Celebrate Bobby’s Life, at noon, on Friday, August 28, 2026, at the Hatherly Country Club, in Scituate, Massachusetts.

ESHET, Dan

DR. DAN ESHET

Dan Eshet, Ph.D., of Newton Centre, MA, passed away on August 23, 2026, surrounded by his family, at home.

Dan was a person of many talents. He was a loving husband to Dr. Sigal Yawetz; and father to Yoni (Yonathan) and the late Avigail. He was a brilliant scholar, a sharp-witted thinker, a deeply sensitive person who cared for all living beings, and a world-class friend. Born on Kibbutz Cabri, in Israel, to Itzhak and Rachel Eshet, Dani, as he was known to many, grew up imbued with a profound ethic of caring. He was a keen student of history and philosophy at Tel Aviv University, where he received his B.A. and M.A. degrees. In 1991, he made a fateful life decision by choosing to continue his studies in the UCLA History Department. A year later, he married Sigal, who was serving as a medical resident at UCLA and the VA hospital. He completed his Ph.D. with a fine dissertation on modern English history. Along the way, he gained renown for throwing a great party, hosting friends, and cooking an amazing gourmet meal.

After completing his doctorate, Dan left Los Angeles for the Boston area, where he would spend the rest of his life. He entered the world of public history, where he served with distinction. For more than a decade, he worked at “Facing History,” the national organization devoted to K-12 education, where he authored a number of important U.S., European, and Jewish history works. He later took up a position as a program director for the Center for Holocaust and Genocide Education at Salem State University, where he introduced legions of students to the Holocaust and other genocides.

Dani was revered for his great intellect, wry sense of humor, vast powers of compassion, and unerring moral compass. All who knew him marveled at his uncommon resilience in the face of challenges, none of which was greater than the death of his daughter, Avigail, at age ten. Dan

LYNCH, Attorney Edward L.

Age 85 years, died peacefully, at Salem Hospital, after a long illness valiantly battled. He is survived by his wife, Elizabeth; brother, Owen and his wife, Anne; his brother-in-law, John Wall; his brother-in-law, Frank Cullinan and his wife, Anne; sister-in-law, Mary Jane and her husband, Tony Rodgers; several nieces and nephews, grandnieces and nephews, and great-grandnephews, as well as his lifelong friends. He was predeceased by his father, Arthur and mother, Louise; brother, Jimmy and his wife, Pat; sister, Marie Wall; and two nieces and one nephew. He graduated from Sacred Heart Grammar School and St Mary’s High School in Lynn, Boston College and Suffolk University Law School. Ed served in the U.S. Army in the 60s, was honorably discharged as a Specialist 5th Class, and held a Top Secret Security Clearance.

A lifelong Lynn resident, who practiced law in Lynn for over 50 years, Ed loved his city and worked tirelessly to better the community all his life. He was committed to providing excellent legal advice and services to his clients. He was devoted to Catholic education in the St. Mary’s community. Ed was renowned for his kindness, generosity and dedication, and would often be seen navigating Lynn in his ’85 silver Volvo.

Ed’s many positions included, serving as Trustee of North Shore Community College. Other achievements included, receiving the Lynn Boys and Girls Club Hall of Fame Recognition, Lynn Public Library Trustee for several years, past Director of the Lynn Chamber of Commerce, member of the Government Affairs Committee of the Lynn Area Chamber of Commerce, past Vice President of the United Cerebral Palsy of the North Shore, co-Founder and past Vice President of the Friends of Lynn and Nahant Beach Inc., former Director of the New Hampshire First Bank, Manchester NH, a member of Lynn Ward four Republican Committee and twice delegate to the State Convention. For many years, Ed was an enthusiastic supporter of the Northshore Philharmonic concert series and of the wide variety of events at the Lynn Auditorium. He was a generous donor to many charities, far too numerous to list.

One of his most esteemed positions was with East Boston Savings Bank, where he served as a Corporator and on the Board of Trustees for several years until his retirement. He loved all the employees that he worked with over the years, had a great and witty sense of humor and loved to gather with friends and family. Those who worked for Ed said they were always treated as family, no birthday went unnoticed and no burden went unlifted. His love of animals was profound, with their wonderful Cocker Spaniels and so many Lynn cats that found a home with him. He took great pride when F. Lee Bailey named him his personal lawyer. Ed had a gift to make others smile and laugh and he loved solving issues for clients and had a lasting impact on those who crossed his path.

His wife wishes to thank the staff of Salem Hospital’s ICU, who gave such loving care and friendship to Ed.

For his love of life, family, friends and clients, Ed will be missed but not forgotten. May his spirit continue to inspire and uplift us.

Funeral Services will begin from the Solimine Funeral Home, on Friday, August 28, at 10 AM, followed by a Funeral Mass in St. Mary’s Church, Lynn, at 11 AM, to which relatives and friends are invited to attend. Burial will follow at St. Joseph’s Cemetery. Visiting Hours are at the Solimine Funeral Home, 67 Ocean St., LYNN, on Thursday, from 4 - 8 PM. Please make memorial donations in his name to St. Mary’s Church, 8 South Common St., Lynn, MA 01902 or an animal welfare group of your choosing.

MARZINO, Mario

Age 78, of Stoneham, passed away, on Sunday, August 16.

He was born in 1948, to Albert and Josephine (Vita) Marzino.

Mario lived in the North End of Boston for a short while, and later in Medford and then Stoneham. He was a graduate of Christopher Columbus High School, Class of 1966. He furthered his education at Mass Bay Community College, and was a graduate of Boston State College, Class of 1971.

He worked for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in the Division of Employment and Training as a supervisor for 35 years. He garnered many awards from various Governors of our state due to the outstanding work he did.

Mario loved his family with his whole heart and soul and was loved back just as much. You could always count on him to be there for you whenever needed. There is not one person that could ever say a bad word about him. He was soft-spoken, but what he had to say was always deeply respected. He was a true gentleman. He was the most loving son, sibling, cousin, nephew, and especially husband to his wife, Janet.

He loved going on vacations with Jan to Florida, Cape Cod, Ogunquit, ME, Newport, RI, and especially North Conway, NH. They also took other memorable trips to Italy, France, Switzerland, and Sicily.

He will be so deeply missed for that warm smile of his, and those big dark brown eyes to look into.

He is survived by his beloved wife, Janet, whom he was married to for 50 years, together for 59 years. His siblings, Eileen Zwicker of North Reading, Frederick Marzino of Reading and Donna (and partner, Christopher) Riordan of Epping, NH. His nieces, Audra (Peter) Masi and Tracy (David) Dion. His nephew, James (and partner, Alyssa) Riordan. And his great-niece, Faith Gargano; and great-nephews, Dil-lon Gargano, David and Christian Dion; and many loving cousins.

He was preceded in death by his parents, Albert and Josephine (Vita) Marzino; and his sister, MaryAnn Pollinger.

His Funeral Mass will be celebrated at St. Patrick Church, where they were married, on October 12, 1975, 71 Central Street, Stoneham, on Friday, August 28, at 10:00 a.m. Visitation for relatives and friends will be held at the McDonald-Finnegan-Anderson Funeral Home, 322 Main Street, STONEHAM, on Thursday, August 27, from 4:00 – 8:00 p.m. Private entombment will be held at Mount Calvary Mausoleum in Manchester, NH.

In lieu of flowers, please consider making a donation in Mario’s name to Lewy Body Dementia Assoc., 912 Killian Hill Rd., SW Lilburn, GA 30047.

Billy Boston, 92; rugby league superstar and trailblazer from the 1950s and ’60s

By Steve Douglas

ASSOCIATED PRESS

Billy Boston, the Welsh rugby league great who blazed a trail for Black sportspeople in Britain during the 1950s and ’60s, has died. He was 92.

Wigan Warriors, the team where Mr. Boston played for most of his illustrious career, announced his death on Tuesday, saying he passed away peacefully and was surrounded by his closest family.

In June last year, Mr. Boston became the first rugby league player to receive a knighthood, in a special ceremony at Buckingham Palace. The investiture was brought forward amid concerns for his health, with Mr. Boston suffering from dementia.

“Billy Boston wasn’t just a legend of Wigan Rugby League,” Wigan chief executive Kris Radlinski said, “he was one of the greatest figures our sport has ever known.”

Mr. Boston was born in the Welsh capital, Cardiff, and grew up playing rugby union before getting noticed by rugby league scouts while on national service in the north of England, the heartland of the 13-man code that split from the more widely played 15-a-side rugby union in the late 1800s.

He signed for Wigan in 1953 at age 19 and played 488 times for the club — scoring a remarkable 478 tries — until 1968, establishing himself as one of the greatest players in the history of rugby league.

Mr. Boston finished his career with a British-record haul of 571 tries in total and was the first Black player to represent Britain on the Lions tour Down Under, scoring 36 tries in 18 appearances in Australia and New Zealand in 1954. He featured in a total of 31 international test matches, including the World Cup final in 1960 when he scored a try in Britain’s win over Australia.

Upon receiving his knighthood last year, Mr. Boston, whose father was from West African country Sierra Leone, was hailed by then-British Prime Minister Keir Starmer as a “true trailblazer” and “a legend of the game who overcame prejudice to represent Great Britain and opened the door to a more diverse game.”

Wigan owner Mike Danson said Mr. Boston “was everybody’s hero.”

“Billy’s legacy was not simply what he achieved,” Danson said. “It was the humility with which he carried it. Despite everything he accomplished, he remained a quiet, dignified and deeply respected man.

“He leaves behind an example that will endure for generations.”

In a club statement, Wigan said Mr. Boston’s death came just weeks after that of his wife, Lady Joan Boston.

Christopher Bodeen; covered China’s rise

By Foster Klug

ASSOCIATED PRESS

TOKYO — Christopher Bodeen, a tenacious, old-school wire service reporter who brought a keen analytical eye and a wry sense of humor to decades of work in China, Taiwan, and in war zones and natural disasters across the globe for the Associated Press, has died. He was 55.

Mr. Bodeen died Aug. 17 after a struggle with cancer and complications from a stroke, his daughter, Ingrid, said Thursday by telephone from Taiwan.

Mr. Bodeen, who spoke fluent Mandarin with a proud Taiwanese accent, spent much of his career detailing China’s rise to an economic, political, and military superpower — and the accompanying friction from what critics have long called Beijing’s heavy-handed efforts to establish dominance in Asia and beyond.

“Chris was a reporter who would go anywhere and do anything for the story,” said Charles Hutzler, AP’s former bureau chief in Beijing. After a huge quake flattened a swath of Sichuan province in 2008, Mr. Bodeen composed his account from one devastated town sentence by sentence over text messages because of damaged telecommunications networks. “It was one of the first eyewitness reports the AP and the world received about one of the worst earthquakes in decades,” Hutzler recalled.

From AP bureaus in Shanghai, Beijing, and Taipei, Mr. Bodeen was for years the news agency’s go-to person on Chinese politics and military issues, able to quickly determine the newsworthiness of the government’s often abstruse statements.

“A chat with Chris would inevitably turn into a remarkable history lesson,” said Emily Wang Fujiyama, former Greater China news director. “He had astounding knowledge of the region and would be writing about China’s military presence in the South China Sea, pivot to Taiwan’s intricate politics, and just as deftly write about the political sensitivities of Tibet, Mongolia and China.”

Mr. Bodeen was born in Missouri on Sept. 9, 1970, but he spent parts of his childhood in the Middle East, Europe, Africa, and Asia. His father was a foreign service officer and his mother a former diplomat, his daughter Ingrid said. Friends and colleagues remembered his love of the Boston Red Sox, esoteric punk rock — and his contagious enthusiasm for the job of journalism.

“He was the blondest, palest person you’ll ever meet” yet also spoke pitch-perfect Chinese, said Ted Anthony, AP’s former China news editor and news director for Asia. “So when the earthquake in Sichuan happened in 2008, he went out there, put on one of his ever-present ballcaps to cover his hair, and slouched down. He passed as Chinese, started interviewing people and sailed under the scrutiny of the authorities.”

Mr. Bodeen joined the AP in 1996, in Taiwan, the self-governing democratic island China claims as its own, before working as an editor on the agency’s international desk in New York and then joining the AP bureau in Beijing as a correspondent, in 2000. He majored in history and Asian studies at Tufts University, graduating in 1993.

“Chris Bodeen was always ready for adventure. Hiding in the hills of Hainan Island, China, to try to report on the return of an American Air Force plane forced down in 2001, he was the best colleague to be with,” said Raf Wober, a video journalist in the AP’s Hong Kong bureau.

In a 2017 story on efforts to burnish the image of Chinese leader Xi Jinping, Mr. Bodeen described state broadcaster China Central Television leading its evening national news bulletin “with more than four minutes of uninterrupted clapping for Xi as he met with adoring citizens,” and a Russian translator who “was so engrossed with reading a recent speech by Xi, Xinhua (the official news agency) said, that he skipped lunch and dinner just to finish studying it.”

While much of this might have seemed amusing to outsiders, Mr. Bodeen was careful to note that “the domination of (Xi’s) image in official propaganda evokes, for some, the painful memories of the upheaval of the 1960s and ’70s, when Mao (Zedong) was accorded the status of a near deity.”

Julie Pace, AP’s executive editor, remembered Mr. Bodeen as not only an effective China correspondent but as a fellow journalist whose knowledge elevated those around him.

“Chris cared deeply about his work and the value of on-the-ground reporting in such an important region of the world,” she said. “His expertise informed AP’s audiences for so many years, but also helped lift up so many colleagues.”

Mr. Bodeen was deeply proud of his two daughters and loved showing off their artwork and achievements — and creative Halloween costumes — to colleagues. “Every parent thinks their kids are the best, but, hand to God, these girls are both adorable and seriously tough cookies,” he wrote of his children.

“He truly, passionately loved what he did, as much as he loved being a dad,” Ingrid Bodeen said. She recalled that when her father spent long stints reporting from Afghanistan during her childhood, “he would always have my mom fax over my spelling lists and homework so we could work on them together. He never missed a spelling test week.”

Mr. Bodeen was also beloved by colleagues for his sharp sense of humor, his knowledge of good local food, and an encyclopedic knowledge of movie and TV comedies from the ’70s and ’80s.

Kanis Leung, an AP reporter in Hong Kong, said that Mr. Bodeen once told her about an old correspondent’s description of news reporting as “the art of shoving 50 pounds of oatmeal into a 10-pound sack.”

“Except,” Mr. Bodeen told Leung, “he didn’t say oatmeal.”

Mr. Bodeen is survived by his wife, Yen Ling, daughters Ingrid, 26, and Naomi, 22, his parents, and a sister.

LENOX — As the final Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the summer approached on Sunday afternoon, the famously unpredictable skies over the Tanglewood lawn were ambiguous and unsettled. Picnickers opened umbrellas and donned jackets as showers spattered the lawn, only to put them away minutes later when the rain passed.

With a waterlogged sun fitfully trying to break through and a 50 percent chance of severe thunderstorms in the forecast, the metaphor seemed too on point to describe the summer the BSO has endured. Were this fiction, my editor would be rightfully roasting me for the cliché. Sometimes you just can't make this stuff up.

The musicians have coped with continuing drama around maestro Andris Nelsons' impending departure, the exhaustion of the intense Tanglewood rehearsal schedule, and contentious and emotional labor contract negotiations, all at the same time. On Saturday, the day before their current contract was due to expire, the musicians announced that the players' committee had been authorized by unanimous vote to call a strike should a contract not be reached. A later announcement that the contract deadline was to be extended from midnight Sunday to Tuesday was more auspicious, but still, while they were on stage this weekend, it wasn't certain whether they'd soon be heading for a few weeks of well-earned rest, or for the orchestra's first strike since it unionized in 1942.

In this charged atmosphere, the BSO performed admirably, and while neither of this weekend's two concerts featured the cleanest or most beautiful playing, the ensemble never shifted into the cruise-control mode that always enervates a concert when hearts and minds just aren't in it. Just as they were running on fumes, they were fighting for every last drop of gas in the tank.

The weekend had begun on Saturday with the Tanglewood Festival Chorus opening in Ozawa Hall with Argentine composer Martin Palmeri's lustrous "Misa a Buenos Aires," also known as "Misatango" — a setting of the Latin Mass suffused with the raw emotion and unique instrumentation of tango music.

Julien Labro's bandoneon was paradoxically punchy and delicate, the sighing of the bellows reflecting the lamenting tack of the music, and mezzo-soprano Zoie Reams's solos were nothing short of captivating. Conducted by guest Jean-Sébastien Vallée, the lower voices of the chorus dug deep into the "Dona nobis pacem" near the end of the final movement, the higher voices gradual-

Violinist Randall Goosby then joined the orchestra and Wilkins for a doubleheader of short pieces for violin and orchestra. The first, Florence Price's recently published Violin Concerto No. 2, could scarcely find a better advocate than Goosby, whose balletic sense of rhythm and graceful phrasing made the piece sparkle with vitality. Price never got to see the piece performed, and if there's a heaven, I hope it receives broadcasts from the Shed.

The second, Saint-Saëns's war-horse showpiece "Introduction and Rondo capriccioso," galloped like a feisty colt as Goosby responded to the orchestra, with Wilkins and the players responding in kind. Dvorák's Symphony No. 8 showed off the exquisite attunement between sections and soloists. A few bars into the first movement, principal flutist Lorna McGhee seamlessly passed an extended note to piccolo Cynthia Meyers on her left; one movement later, the two responded to the increasingly ponderous string melody with a tartly accented twist on a repeated phrase. The final movement was Dvorák at his rowdiest, McGhee's solo darting to and fro like a mischievous pixie and the horns sounding off with controlled force.

Sunday's choral opener, a movement from Brahms's "German Requiem," was patchier than the "Psalms" or the Mass but built to a bluntly magnificent chord near the end. Guest conductor Gustavo Gimeno made some unexpected and intriguing choices with the Beethoven, keeping the scherzo at a measured tempo with intense accents that brought the winds and brass more to the front than usual, as John Ferrillo's oboe jabbed out his line with the precision of a sewing machine's needle.

Near the end, the low strings' first intonation of the famous "Ode to Joy" melody materialized like a soap bubble, shimmering and fragile; those low strings seemed to sigh with relief at realizing it wasn't going to vanish when the violins picked it up. The vocal solo quartet and the chorus duly joined in to see the Ninth to its explosive finale. Tenor Ben Bliss proved his last name accurate with his seemingly effortless dance through the high-flying military march, which more often than not leaves singers gasping for air.

So what now? Shortly before the concert on Sunday, the news broke that the musicians and management had agreed to extend the contract by 48 hours, aiming to reach an agreement before the new expiration deadline late Tuesday night. While only minimal details about the negotiations have been made public, the musicians are seeking a more prominent and defined role in artistic decision-making within the organization, such as the selection of a new music director to succeed Nelsons.

Personally, I hope they get some power, and I hope it sticks. Management has talked to various news outlets about the necessity of restoring and rebuilding trust with the musicians, but the ever-present red flowers on many musicians's jackets indicate that it's been perceived as just talk.

Also, early September brings the retirement of BSO vice president of artistic planning Anthony Fogg, a publicity-averse logistics maven who earned significant respect from both the BSO musicians and a worldwide network of musical names during his three-plus decades at the orchestra. The orchestra indicated earlier this year that Fogg would remain in an advisory role after his retirement, but given the already-unstable environment triggered by the surprise termination of Nelsons' contract, who can blame the musicians for feeling short on trusted allies, possibly soon to be even shorter after Nelsons leaves next summer? The musicians seem to be telling management what they need in order to begin rebuilding trust, and it would behoove management to listen, even if they can't fulfill everything. My hope is this: As the troubled skies above Stockbridge Bowl before the concert may have reflected the present moment, so might the sunny blue vista that lit the way out portend the future.

Lindsay Clancy's attorney Kevin Reddington gives 'girl dad' energy, and it's making him a star

By Beth Teitell
GLOBE STAFF

Who can even bear to watch? Three sweet lives have been cut short, and in Plymouth Superior Court, there sits Lindsay Clancy, accused of murdering her own children, slumped and sobbing in her wheelchair as prosecutors detail their autopsies.

The Commonwealth is arguing that she acted intentionally and should be held criminally responsible. Clancy contends she was suffering from postpartum psychosis and is mounting an insanity defense. No matter how the jury decides, there will be no happy outcome, no winners, only losers, lives lost, families shattered.

But in the parallel universe of social media, where real-world tragedies are mined for memes and clicks, the trial has taken on the whiff of a true crime story, of entertainment.

And so it is that smitten Clancy supporters have turned her lawyer, veteran defense attorney Kevin J. Reddington, into an object of fascination.

"Is anyone else crushing on Kevin Reddington?" one TikTok asked. "People's sexiest man alive 2026!" another proclaimed.

"His accent is top notch," read one comment.

"Sidebahlh," responded another.

Clancy's supporters see in Reddington a man fighting not just for his client, but for every mother who's been in crisis, every woman who's had any mental health struggle at all, and felt ignored or worse by the medical establishment.

And yes, they're talking about that

Kevin J. Reddington — the blunt courtroom fighter out of Brockton, a hammer of a cross-examiner, a man who wears a suit and still somehow appears a bit rumpled.

The fangirls are gushing on Facebook, too. "... having half the female population in love with a 75-year-old man was NOT on my 2026 bingo card," one user wrote.

"Papa Red gives me girl dad energy in the deepest way," a viral post reads. "And I know, I know... Kevin Reddington is Lindsay's attorney. ... He is supposed to fight for her.

"But there is something about the way he does it. The way he stands behind her when she is breaking. The way he reaches for her hand. The way he seems to know when she needs a second..."

Reddington may be new to many, if not most, people devouring trial news in the New York Post, Ms. magazine, the Hindustan Times, the BBC, and, according to a local mom, at least one sorority house at the University of Georgia. But in local and legal circles, Reddington, a 1975 Suffolk Law School graduate, has been well known for decades.

"Renowned lawyer defending Duxbury mother Lindsay Clancy has a history of tackling crimes driven by severe mental illness," the Globe wrote on Feb. 4, 2023, soon after the Jan. 24, 2023, killings.

He was "the first lawyer in the state to successfully argue that battered woman syndrome 'amounts to temporary insanity,' making the defendant not responsible for her crime," the Globe reported.

In decades of defense work, he has represented New England mafia boss

Frank Salemme, Whitey Bulger's longtime girlfriend Catherine Greig, and Red Sox slugger Mo Vaughn, who was acquitted of drunken driving after Reddington argued that it was the shock from the crash, a knee injury, and off-season weight gain that caused Vaughn to fail sobriety tests, not alcohol.

And now, in a world grown evermore ravenous for trials, especially one with a moniker like "accused killer mom" — in Court TV parlance — Reddington's legend is growing.

His admirers refer to him as "K-Shred," and "Big Red." Online, you can buy "Better Call Kevin" T-shirts and keychains, or a hoodie lionizing him as the "GOAT."

An expat following the case from France recently saw a picture of him as a young man and emailed me in a swoon. "He looked just like Tom Selleck in 'Magnum, P.I.'" she wrote.

What's going on? Kathryn D. Coduto, an assistant professor of media science at Boston University, says Reddington, a serious man doing a serious job, has been turned into a "character" on social media.

"When people are following true crime stories, they are looking for people to connect with," she said, noting that the audience for true crime skews female. "And typically they are connecting with the victim.

"But this story changes that script," she said. "Many women are not turning on Lindsay Clancy, but they are empathizing with her. So to have a defense attorney who is a male and who is looking out for her, and showing how the system failed her, really resonates with these people."

Beyond that, said Pamela Rutledge, director of the Media Psychology Research Center, an independent research organization, Reddington projects competence, confidence, wit, and authority.

MARK STOCKWELL/POOL

"Sexy" can be shorthand for that whole package," she emailed. "He fits a familiar archetype. At 75, with decades of courtroom experience, tattoos ... and [a] martial arts background, he fits on to the "grizzled master" or "silver fox" audiences recognize from fiction.

"His humor provides emotional relief," she added, "but his intensity signals power and danger — all features that have fueled a participatory fandom."

But of course the trial is divisive — Clancy has admitted she strangled her three young children — and not everyone reveres him.

"Why has this guy become a hero to the people claiming Lindsay is completely innocent?" a Redditor asked.

"The guy is a defense lawyer. Growing up I've always heard they are some [of] the scummiest people."

On a recent day, as the defense was nearing the end of its case, a call went out online for Clancy's supporters to rally outside the courthouse. "Wear pink," it read. "Stand together. Stand in silence."

And early on Thursday, Aug. 20, they came by the hundreds and gathered behind yellow "caution" tape across from the courthouse. And then, a little after 8 a.m., he appeared, Reddington.

A pink roar rose, and then rose some more, and from somewhere came a heartfelt cry. "We love you, Kevin!"

Soon, he was surrounded by reporters and camera people and individual content providers live-streaming the scene for their followers.

"What do you think about you being the advocate for all women right now?" he was asked.

"I'm not an advocate," he responded pleasantly. "But you are," someone in the media scrum said. "You are."

With that, Reddington walked into the courthouse, and from behind their yellow "caution" tape, the admirers whooped and clapped and held up their phones to film their star. "Kevin, we need you over here," a woman yelled out.

Overhead, a drone buzzed.

10 meals that make the most of the season's last gasp

By Devra First
GLOBE STAFF

Here we are again, at that bittersweet time of year when markets and menus are bursting with beautiful summer corn, tomatoes, and peaches, yet the first apples are appearing, the fall chill is undeniable in the evenings, and a Pavlovian desire to purchase spiral notebooks burbles up from deep in the soul. You can never have too many notebooks. But also, no. It's too soon to let go of summer. Labor Day is late this year, accommodating the illusion that fall — the best season, in its good time — is the future and the summer is now. Long, lazy days! Trips to the beach! Leisured outdoor dinners with friends and wine! These can be ours, at least for a few more days, even as goldenrod yellow school buses begin to fill the streets. Here are 10 meals to keep that summer feeling alive a little longer, even if you're already packing school lunches and surveying your collection of light to midweight jackets. You can never have too many jackets.

TACOS AND GELATO IN EAST BOSTON

Embrace the neighborhood's Mexican and Italian culinary riches in one swoop. It's the best of all eating worlds. After feasting on Taqueria Jalisco's tacos (above, $4.50-$17.99; try the excellent birria version), walk over to Slush King for slush or house-made gelato. The taqueria has two branches; for this, you'll want the original, smaller Bennington Street location, 2 minutes by foot from dessert. Slush King's walk-up window serves its frozen specialty in all-natural fruit flavors such as lemon, pineapple, and strawberry ($2.50-$4.50); you can (and should) get a parfait of slush and soft-serve layered together ($5-$6). For gelato, pistachio, coffee Oreo, and salted butter caramel are among the offerings ($4-$6). There are also frappes, sundaes, and more.

Fresh-roasted coffee, direct from Colombia to East Boston

By Celina Colby
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Marcela Villa has high standards when it comes to a cup of coffee. The Colombian native was raised on freshly ground, single-origin beans, and for years she relied on trips back home for her caffeine supply. Now she's importing her family's beans to East Boston where she lives. Villa's uncle, Luis Alfonso Buitrago, and his wife's family began growing coffee on a small farm in La Vega, Colombia, in 2013 after their passionfruit crop was ravaged by disease. It takes six or seven years from the first planting to harvest, clean, dry, and roast the beans, but the resulting coffee, dubbed Don Luis de la Vega after Buitrago's father-in-law, tastes smooth and strong with notes of cacao and the passionfruit that formerly grew on the land. "This started as a family project," says Villa. "In Colombia we do everything with love." In La Vega, the brew is most often enjoyed as a "tinto," a piping

Attention shoppers: Market Basket-inspired cabaret show coming soon

By Kara Baskin
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Crank up the yacht rock and let the air-conditioning flow: Boston cabaret and bar Jacque's (79 Broadway St.) will host two Market Basket-inspired drag and burlesque shows on Wednesday, Sept. 23. The spectacle, called "Market Rate," is a tribute to New England's iconic grocery store. Tickets go on sale today at 2 p.m. The two-hour performances will include "a small rotisserie chicken-eating competition," according to co-organizer and producer Gnat, who says the concept originated as a joke among friends but quickly took off. "The thing about New Englanders is that they love New England, and love to hate it, and hate to love it," Gnat says. "You bring in a niche reference, and folks immediately connect to that representation. I mean, just look at the most recent Noah Kahan tours — the lyrics that reference Boston [and] New England landed so strongly with the New England audience at the Fenway stops."

New England racks up Good Food Awards

This June, the Good Food Awards, now in its 16th year, announced its 2026 winners, recognizing artisan food producers whose products aren't just delicious but also made responsibly.

Out of 1,200 entries nationwide, 19 New England producers took home 24 awards, each earning the right to display the coveted blue Good Food Award seal on their packaging. Every entry is blind-tasted and judged across 18 categories, from cheese and chocolate to drinks, grains, pantry staples, honey, oils, preserves, and snacks.

For Dick Chase of Maine Sauce and Provisions in New Castle, Maine, winning a Good Food Award in the pantry category for his bright, citrusy Resurgam Spruced Up Hot Sauce called for an unlikely comparison: Sally Field's famous 1985 Oscar speech.

"I can't deny the fact that you like me," Chase jokes. "Right now, you like me."

The award is the kind of validation Chase says makes the work — fermenting and blending only Maine-grown jalapenos and tomatillos into every batch — feel worth it.

"It's a validation that something I've poured my heart and soul into really does taste great," he says.

Angela Chicoine, owner of The Tippy Pickle in South Burlington, Vt., is a repeat Good Food Award winner. Chicoine infuses pickles with Vermont-made spirits, beer, or cider, and two of her creations, Demon Seed and Maple Bourbon Whiskey, took home wins this year.

"It's huge for me, and I'm ecstatic I won again," she says.

Here is the list of New England winners:

PEARLE

Vegan caviars are popping. Often made from seaweed or other marine plants, they challenge the cost and ecological toll of traditional sturgeon roe while delivering at least some of its requisite brininess and polish.

Among the newest brands to the market is Massachusetts-made Pearl. Harvard Business School graduate Ash Overbeek, along with a team of chefs and food scientists, transforms kombu, tamari, tomato concentrate, and other plant-based extracts into tiny, glossy, gray beads that taste ocean-y and umami-rich, but not fishy. Delicate but resilient, they're great for scooping up with a potato chip or spooning onto blini.

"We didn't want to mimic caviar, but [to] create a new product that celebrates the taste of its ingredients," Overbeek says.

Her path to Pearl was shaped as much by conviction as culinary ambition. With a background in earth systems as well as sustainability work across both the fashion and art industries and endangered populations, Overbeek says she struggled at events where caviar was served.

Overbeek hopes plant-based "caviar" like her shelf-stable product will establish its own category when people look for celebratory foods. "I'm passionate about conservation," she says, "but still making people feel special."

Pearle is currently sold as a set for $98, which includes a 50-gram tin, a stainless steel serving shell, a mother-of-pearl spoon, and a key to open the tin. Standalone 50-gram tins, priced at $50, will soon be available; all are sold at pearlecaviar.com.

THE CONFIDENT COOK GOOD FOOD AND KITCHEN KNOW-HOW

Upgrade your panini with fresh mozzarella, pesto, and roasted peppers

KAROLINE BOEHM GOODNICK FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

Mozzarella Panini with Roasted Red Peppers and Pesto

Serves 4

- 3 red bell peppers
- 1 clove garlic, coarsely chopped
- 2 cups fresh basil leaves
- ½ cup olive oil (¼ cup for pesto, ¼ cup for sandwiches)
- ¼ cup freshly grated Parmesan cheese
- Salt and black pepper, to taste
- 8 slices sourdough or other hearty white bread
- 1 pound fresh mozzarella, cut into 8 slices

- Set the oven at 500 degrees. Have on hand a small rimmed baking sheet.
- Place the peppers on the baking sheet. Roast for 20 minutes, or until the skins are blackened and mostly charred. Transfer the peppers to a bowl, cover tightly with plastic wrap, and leave to cool.
- Meanwhile, in a food processor, pulse the garlic and basil until finely chopped. With the motor running, drizzle ¼ cup of the olive oil through the feed tube. Add the Parmesan and a pinch each of salt and black pepper. Pulse until thoroughly blended.
- When the peppers are cool enough to handle, use your hands to remove and discard the blackened skins, stems, seeds, and cores. Slice the flesh into large pieces.
- Lay the peppers and mozzarella slices on paper towels. Pat dry with another paper towel, pressing lightly to release excess water.
- Lay 4 slices of bread on the counter. Spread pesto on each one. Top with slices of mozzarella and peppers and sprinkle with salt and black pepper. Top the sandwiches with the second slice of bread.
- In a large skillet over medium heat, heat 1 tablespoon of the olive oil. Add 2 sandwiches and cook, pressing lightly on them with a large metal spatula, for 3 to 5 minutes or until the undersides are golden brown. Remove the sandwiches from the pan, add 1 tablespoon more of the olive oil, and turn the sandwiches over into the pan. Cook for 3 to 5 minutes more, or until the undersides are golden and the cheese is completely melted. Remove from the pan. (Total cooking time is 6 to 10 minutes.) Cook the remaining sandwiches in the remaining olive oil in the same way.

Market Basket-themed cabaret coming soon

While Noah Kahan is certainly no Arthur DeMoulas, Gnat does note that New England has a long history of locally themed drag and burlesque shows. In 2025, Jacque's hosted "MBTGay: A Transsit Drag Show."

Approximately 60 performers auditioned for the Market Basket homage, with a dozen or so making the more-for-your-dollar cut. Selected performers include standup comic Andi Van Dyke and burlesque performer Stabitha Christie. The show includes two acts, with an intermission.

"You can expect drag, burlesque, and maybe even some live singing," says Gnat, who notes that a pre-show playlist spotlights tunes one might hear whilst cruising the aisles.

This is a different kind of drama for the beloved chain, which most recently made headlines when longtime CEO DeMoulas was ousted by Market Basket's board of directors.

This evening has a more benevolent angle: It benefits a few food charities. Jacque's will accept monetary donations for Haley House, the West Roxbury Food Pantry, and the Allston-Brighton Food Pantry at both performances. The shows are 21-plus.

Reps for Market Basket had no comment about the performance. Get tickets at <https://posh.vip/e/market-rate>.

Hearty, toasty, golden-brown panini get an upgrade with fresh mozzarella, homemade pesto, and roasted red peppers. Prep is minimal. Roast the peppers in a very hot oven, whir the pesto in a food processor with some of the beautiful basil you're seeing in your own garden or at farm stands, and slice mozzarella and sourdough.

Traditional pesto recipes call for pine nuts, and sometimes walnuts, but both are omitted here (the pesto is less expensive without them). If a plentiful harvest means you have access to much more basil, double or triple the recipe and freeze it in ice cube trays. On nights when time is tight, defrost a couple of cubes and use commercially prepared roasted peppers. Pat dry both peppers and mozzarella before layering so the bread toasts up nicely with a pleasant crunch. All you need is a big heavy skillet. Make it for family dinner, or cut smaller pieces to go with a salad at your summer rental.

They quit their jobs to bet on Brazilian cheese bread

By Kara Baskin
GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

Cambridge's Heli Silva, 45, moved from New Jersey to Massachusetts at 19 after his mom died. He took low-level cooking jobs before landing a prep cook position at Sel de la Terre. He moved on to cook at Myers + Chang, The Lower Depths, Deuxave, and Lolita. He also ran an underground kitchen with pals from his apartment — a French-Asian mashup where he taught himself to cook elaborate recipes like honeysuckle gastrique.

Now, the self-taught chef runs Galley Provisions with his wife, Kelly. The pair specialize in pão de queijo, gluten-free Brazilian cheese bread, served at farmers' markets throughout Greater Boston. They have a new home base at Commonwealth Kitchen, where they balance their fledgling enterprise with two kids — and, until recently, full-time jobs. Heli continued to work while launching the business, while Kelly bartended at Blue Ribbon Sushi. This summer, they quit to focus on Galley full time.

“One of our goals is to offer our bread in school systems and public schools,” he says. “It’s our goal to have pão de queijo Brazilian cheese bread in everybody’s freezer.”

How did you get into this business?

I grew up in New Jersey. My mom passed away, and I came to Massachusetts at 19 to start my future. I wasn't sure what that entailed, but I lived with a few guys, and we had this idea to do an underground kitchen. So we did a pop-up kitchen out of our apartment, rented tables, and sold tickets.

What about Massachusetts intrigued you? Why here?

I knew a minister here in Massachusetts from my church camp, a young guy, and I knew he was doing a ministry with youth in Lynn. I called him up, and he opened the doors of his apartment.

I waited tables for the first six years, I started helping with the underground kitchen, and I fell in love with cooking. I approached a friend of mine — he's very well-known in the food scene, Louis DiBiccari — and, at the time, he was the chef at Sel de la Terre on Boylston Street. He gave me one of my first kitchen jobs, prepping in the morning. I made it to line cook at lunch.

Why food?

My mother raised my brother and me as a single parent, and she was a brilliant cook. She would make pão de queijo for my birthday. Because we were so poor, we never went out to eat. It was only home-cooked meals, rice, beans.

A lot of people don't realize that Brazil is a melting pot. There are a lot of different food influences in Brazil. My mother would cook gnocchi when I was a kid, and when I moved to Massachusetts, I went on a date to the North End. At this point, I'm super young.

We're looking at the menu, and I read “gnocchi” and said, “I thought this was an Italian place. They have Brazilian gnocchi.” I just attached it to our culture, because Italy has a tremendous influence on the cuisine in Brazil.

Another thing about my mother is she ran a takeout operation out of our apartment when we were kids to make ends meet. She cleaned houses for a living, but she would do nails at this lady's house on the weekends. Women from all over would come to this woman's house, a friend of hers, to get their hair done, their nails done. My mom had this reputation for being such a wonderful cook, so through word of mouth she would [prepare] a dish of the week, a dish from Brazil, and she would have my cousin deliver the meals out of our apartment. In a way, it was her underground kitchen.

How did you launch your own business?

When I met Kelly 12 years ago, I walked into her apartment about two months into dating, and it smelled like my house did when I was a kid. Kelly had learned to make Brazilian cheese bread on her own, and had baked cheese bread for me as a surprise.

When we had our son, Kelly would freeze batches of cheese bread. She would bake them off for our family, for our kids, like my mother did. Two years ago, Kelly and I were having lunch and talking, and she's like, “Do you think we could make a business out of this cheese bread?”

I told her: “I think you're insane.” Our daughter was 1. Our son was 5. I was a chef 50 hours a week. I had opened Lolita as their executive chef, and then I was working for Restaurant Associates in corporate. Kelly was bartending for Blue Ribbon Sushi. But she convinced me.

I want to understand the risk this entails, because people might not know what it takes to launch a food business. Kelly and I had to decide: Do we just stop what we're doing and launch this business? We kept working full time, and we started to cross off the things that we needed to cross off to get the business going.

It's really a testament to how wonderful Kelly has been through all this, to have a full-time job, raise two children, and start this business. We make the bread, we package the bread, we sell the bread.

We got a tremendous reception when we started the farmers' markets. This was at the beginning of the summer last year. We were only able to get into a handful of markets. We made it through the summer. Still, I was working. Kelly was still working.

Then we got into the winter, which was a scary time. There were a lot fewer markets, but we still found a few, and we pushed through. We went from four or five markets last year to being in 26 different towns around Massachusetts.

Kelly and I do 12 to 13 farmers' markets a week.

We just quit our jobs in July. Our son is in a little office in the commissary because camp is done. Our daughter is in day care. Kelly and I packed 200 bags of cheese bread, and now I'm going to a market. We'll work markets till 6 or 7 o'clock. Kelly will [pick up at day care]. I'll pack up, and then we'll meet at the house. This repeats Tuesday through Sunday right now.

There's something really special to be said about Kelly and our business and her vision. We get this question a lot at farmers' markets: “Are you Brazilian?”

It's something that Kelly was very afraid of in the beginning. She's like, “I'm Korean, adopted, my parents were Polish and Irish.”

Brazil is a melting pot, like the United States. If you've ever met Brazilians, no one Brazilian looks like the other. I have cousins who look Japanese. My dad is Black. My mother was white. Brazil is Brazil because of its diversity.

And you're both self-taught.

Yes. Not an ounce of culinary school in Kelly or me, but Kelly has always been an excellent baker. I'm not going to say I'm a great cook or anything like that, but I've cooked under a lot of wonderful chefs: Chris Coombs, Adrienne Wright, and Joanne Chang, who everybody knows in Boston — a brilliant chef, brilliant entrepreneur. I've really been blessed, to be honest, to work under these brilliant people.

Let's talk about Boston as a food city. What do we do well, and where do we have room to improve?

Boston as a food city does well because — I don't know how to put it — they get after it. All the chefs in this town love food, and the food scene is so diverse. We're not New York; Michelin just came to see us after all this time. In a way, it's naturally made the chefs in Boston strive to get their food out there. That's one of the biggest and best things about the Boston food scene and why it's good: You have these hungry chefs who aren't in the biggest spotlight, but because of that, the best food comes from it.

Where do we have room to improve?

Like every other food scene, how we run our kitchens and take care of our people. Coming up in kitchens over the last two decades, I feel like I was a part of this group who learned to cook in very intense, very underappreciated [environments]. I have a lot of friends, cooks, who passed away because of drugs and alcohol, because of suicide.

We have made giant strides. Please don't get me wrong. A lot has changed since COVID, but I think there's still a lot of room for improvement.

If you were running a restaurant, what would you do? What needs to happen?

I think pay needs to increase for cooks, the people in the trenches. Cooks will earn anything from $16 to $20 an hour. Devoting 40 to 50 hours a week, working holidays, missing family time, missing time for themselves, exchanging time for money at $16 an hour, doesn't inspire anybody. Nor is it a living wage. To have a kitchen crew that's going to perform and create and provide excellent dishes, it needs to start there.

Where does the money come from?

There's this dream, I feel like, when somebody opens a restaurant. It's: I'm going to serve great food; I'm going to be successful and earn a lot of money. That's where it starts. But I feel like, in the US, there's a restaurant on every corner. The general idea is: Oh, I can open a restaurant, and it's going to be like this — when, in fact, to own a restaurant, you have to have a chef operate the restaurant. You need a front of the house manager. There's not a lot of money at the top to put in your pocket, and I think that's where it starts. The owners of these restaurants are taking too much of the pie, because you want to have this glorious life. But, unfortunately, the margins are so thin that it's really not the best business to start.

Are you able to make a living doing what you do now? Is that better than what you were doing before?

Kelly and I just hit a year. We're grossing more money than we did when we didn't work for ourselves, but at the same time, we're the employees. We're not CEOs who are managing a staff. Kelly and I do literally everything. Every penny that we make, we're either putting back into the business or we're paying our bills. In the future, if we keep going at the pace that we're going, there will be more room. Then again, our business has way better margins than the restaurant business.

What's your favorite neighborhood restaurant?

We live right in Harvard Square, over Dumpling House. We get the twice-cooked pork and lobster with scallions.

What food do you hate?

Smoked puffin.

That's probably the most niche answer I've ever gotten to this question.

You know, I eat a lot of things. I love food. I love pate. I love liver. But Kelly and I were in Iceland for our honeymoon, and I ordered smoked puffin. It was silly of me, but I thought it would be like quail or something. It was more like a fish texture, like a tuna texture. There's photographic evidence of me trying it, and I will never eat that ever again.

SEASONAL RECIPES

WHAT TO COOK THIS WEEK

SALLY PASLEY VARGAS FOR THE BOSTON GLOBE

Spicy Shrimp and Avocado Tostadas

Serves 4

Fried, flat corn tortillas make a crunchy canvas for spicy shrimp and avocado in these summery tostadas. Look for commercially made tostada shells at the supermarket or make your own: Brush small corn tortillas with olive oil, and bake at 400 degrees for 8 to 10 minutes, flipping once, until they're crisp and lightly browned. For the topping, toss the shrimp with chile powder, smoked paprika, and chipotle chile powder — ground smoked and dried jalapeños — for a kick of heat. Saute the shrimp for a couple of minutes until just cooked. Fold them into a chunky salsa of cherry tomatoes and avocado, then spoon it over the crisp shells. It's a quick, light meal for the spice lovers at your table.

SHRIMP

- 1 teaspoon ancho chile powder or a chile powder blend
 - 1 teaspoon smoked paprika
 - ½ teaspoon ground cumin
 - ¼ teaspoon chipotle chile powder or cayenne pepper
 - ¼ teaspoon salt
 - 2 cloves garlic, finely chopped
 - 3 tablespoons mild vegetable oil
 - 1 pound large shrimp (21 to 25), peeled and patted dry with paper towels
1. In a bowl large enough to hold all the shrimp ingredients, combine the chile powder, smoked paprika, cumin, chipotle or cayenne, and salt. Stir to blend them. Add the shrimp, garlic, and 1 tablespoon of the oil. Toss

- to coat the shrimp all over.
2. In a large skillet over medium-high heat, heat the remaining 2 tablespoons oil. Add the shrimp and spread them to make one layer in the skillet. Cook for 1 minute. Turn and cook 1 minute more, or until the shrimp are cooked through. Transfer to a plate.
3. When the shrimp are cool enough to handle, remove the tails if there are any, and cut each shrimp into 2 or 3 bite-size pieces.

TOSTADAS

- 2 limes, 1 juiced, 1 quartered
- 3 tablespoons finely chopped red onion
- ½ teaspoon salt
- 1 pint cherry tomatoes, halved or quartered, if large
- 2 firm, ripe avocados, halved, pits removed, flesh cut into cubes
- 8 (5-inch or 6-inch) corn tostada shells
- ¼ cup nacho-style pickled jalapeños (for garnish)
- ½ cup fresh cilantro leaves (for garnish)

1. In a bowl large enough to hold all the tostados and shrimp ingredients, stir together the lime juice, red onion, and salt. Let stand for 5 minutes.
2. Add the cherry tomatoes and shrimp. Toss well. Gently fold in the avocados. Taste for seasoning, and add more salt, if you like.
3. Spoon about ½ cup of the filling over each tostada. Sprinkle with pickled jalapeños and cilantro. Serve with lime wedges.

Corn and White Bean Salad

Serves 6

This healthful summery salad includes corn, cucumbers, beans, tomatoes, celery, and herbs. The first step is lightly pickling the onion, cukes, and celery, which softens the onion's sharpness and gives the cucumbers and celery a bright flavor. Use a sweet onion or red onion, which isn't as strong as a yellow onion. Slice three mini cucumbers, two pickling cukes, or one long slicing cucumber. Cut the tomatoes into thin strips or wedges so the salad has lots of shapes and textures. Serve with grilled swordfish, baked seafood, broiled chicken, or a big rare steak.

- ¼ medium sweet onion or red onion, thinly sliced
- ¼ cup apple cider vinegar
- 1 teaspoon sugar
- Salt and black pepper, to taste
- 3 mini cucumbers or 2 pickling cucumbers or 1 slicing cucumber, very thinly sliced
- 2 ribs celery, halved lengthwise and very thinly sliced
- 4 ears fresh corn, shucked
- ½ jalapeno, cored, seeded, and cut into matchsticks
- ¼ cup olive oil
- 1 can (about 15 ounces) white beans, such as cannellini, Great Northern, or navy beans, drained and rinsed
- ½ cup chopped fresh herbs (basil, parsley, cilantro)
- 1 large tomato, cored, and cut into thin strips or wedges, or ½ pint cherry tomatoes, halved

1. In a bowl large enough to hold all the ingredients, combine the onion, vinegar, sugar, and a generous pinch each of salt and black pepper. Leave at room temperature for 10 minutes. Stir in the cucumbers and celery. Set aside, stirring occasionally, for 15 to 30 minutes, or until the onion and cucumbers are lightly pickled. (Total pickling time is 25 to 40 minutes.)
2. Bring a saucepan of salted water to a boil.
3. Meanwhile, set 1 ear of corn flat on a cutting board. Working from the thick to the narrow end, cut off 2 or 3 rows of kernels. Turn and cut off 2 or 3 more rows. Continue in this way until all the kernels are off all the cobs. Transfer the kernels to a bowl. Continue with the remaining ears of corn.
4. Drop the corn kernels into the boiling water and let the water return to a boil. Let the water bubble for 2 minutes. Without further cooking, tip the kernels into a colander and rinse with very cold tap water to stop the cooking. Shake the colander well to remove excess water. Leave the corn to cool.
5. To the large bowl with the onion mixture, add the corn, jalapeno, olive oil, beans, and herbs. Stir well again.
6. Taste for seasoning, and add more salt and black pepper, if you like. You can make the salad ahead up to this point; cover and refrigerate for up to 4 hours.
7. Fold in the tomatoes. Transfer the salad to a shallow serving dish or bowl.

OYSTERS ON THE SOUTH SHORE

Hi, it's me, a broken record. Sorry/not sorry for telling you every year that a visit to Island Creek Raw Bar is a quintessential summer experience. Everyone from dogs and babies to the most embittered professional diner (cough) is happy here beside Duxbury Bay, enjoying the view, soaking up the sun, playing lawn games, and eating local oysters ($3 each) alongside a summery beverage. The oyster farm is located here, and the Island Creek, Howland's Honeydrop, and Aunt Dotty varieties are pristine. Caviar is aged and packed onsite, too; order it as a hot dog topping, if you like.

PACK A PICNIC

Farmers' markets are at their peak. Stock up on items such as focaccia from Mahalab Bakery (above), Mozzarella House mozzarella, Boston Smoked Fish Co.'s bluefish pate, heirloom tomatoes from the Neighborhood Farm, Brookwood Community Farm's insanely juicy doughnut peaches, and kombucha from Luluna or sparkling apple cider from Kimball Fruit Farm — the makings of a delightful picnic. Head home to pack up sandwiches and gloriously cyclospora-free salad, or just tote it straight to the beach or park. DINNER IN THE GARDEN

Oleana in Cambridge has the loveliest outdoor dining spot around — a charming garden on a brick patio, open as weather permits (with a little help from umbrellas, heaters, and blankets). Here you can enjoy spinach falafel, salmon crudo, sultan's delight (tamarind beef with smoky eggplant), and of course the famous baked Alaska, all in nature's embrace. (My recommendation: the chef's choice menu of vegetable meze and dessert for $75.) The patio is for walk-ins only, so arrive early to maximize your chances of getting a seat.

FRIED CLAMS ON THE NORTH SHORE

Where they are intended to be eaten. You've got options, but the Clam Box of Ipswich — open since 1935 — is my top choice for expertly fried, native whole-belly clams. The place is so committed to the bit, the gray-shingled building actually looks like a clam box, open at the top and waiting to be filled with sweet, plump, briny morsels in a light, crunchy golden batter. These must be eaten at one of the picnic tables outside, accompanied by chowder and steamers. (There are clam strips, too, but better to go for a fisherman's platter or lobster roll.) Plates ($39.75 for native clams with two sides) are generous; mini meals ($30.75 for native clams with one side) are available, too. Or be a purist and just get the clams in the box that the place is named for ($31.79-$41.79).

TIKI DRINKS BY THE BEACH

In Saugus, Kowloon is an icon, beloved for classic Chinese-American dishes and Polynesian elaborate drinks. This summer, Kowloon Tiki on the Beach opened in Revere, a stroke of genius: Take Kowloon's kitschy flair, but make it a beachside bar. Pupu platters ($32.95) and other longtime favorites are here (yes, you can take the Saugus wings out of Saugus), along with poke tacos ($21.50), Hawaiian-influenced soy-pineapple chicken with Spam fried rice ($24), and other island-y fare. A Zombie, Painkiller, zero-proof Mai Tai, or other tiki classic ($9-$18) is a must.

Nothing says a nostalgic farewell to New England summer like a visit to an old-fashioned ice cream stand. (Yes, ice cream counts as a meal.) If you haven't been to Benson's Homemade Ice Cream or Rota Spring Farm, two Massachusetts favorites, consider this a sign. In Boxford, Benson's specializes in ice cream made with fresh local fruit ($6.50-$11.75). Head here throughout the summer for strawberry, raspberry, blackberry, peach, blueberry, corn, and other seasonal flavors. Rota Spring Farm has everything you need for a family outing: goats, check; bucolic setting, check; excellent ice cream ($4.90-$6.85), check. Colombian coffee imported to East Boston hot serving of black coffee enjoyed throughout the day from breakfast until after dinner. Like its Spanish counterpart the “cafecito,” a “tinto” isn’t necessarily tied to a specific type of coffee so much as the act of taking a break in the day for a cup, usually shared with others. It’s a form of community and hospitality, the first thing offered when visiting someone’s home.

►COFFEE

Colombia, where the climate is stable with regular rain and consistent warm temperatures particularly well-suited to growing coffee, is one of the world’s largest producers of coffee, and the industry is dominated by small-scale farmers like Buitrago. According to the Colombian national Rural Agricultural Planning Unit, a government organization under the Ministry of Agriculture and Rural Development, there are around 549,000 coffee farmers in the country producing 10.6 million 150-pound sacks of coffee per year.

The industry is also significantly supported by the government. Villa says the Colombian Federation of Coffee, a nonprofit organization that works with coffee farmers, provides a lot of backing to new and small growers and buys the excess beans that don’t make it into the Don Luis bag.

Villa moved from Bogota to Boston in 2011 to join her then boyfriend, now husband. Since the first batch of Don Luis was produced in 2021, she would enjoy the coffee when she visited La Vega a few times a year. But by January 2026, she couldn’t keep the secret to herself. She began importing the coffee to Boston and selling the beans (whole or ground) to friends and neighbors.

Lucas Londono, the lead server at farm-to-table restaurant Henrietta’s Table in Harvard Square, was one of Villa’s first customers. A fellow Colombian native, he was thrilled to have a regular source for fresh, high-quality coffee.

“When you’re Colombian, you grow up drinking coffee from when you’re five years old,” says Londono. You become very picky about it.” With Don Luis, he adds, “every sip, every morning, it tastes like home.”

Don Luis is a medium roast, and Villa says it’s as nice to drink black as it is in lattes and cappuccinos. Londono even used it in an espresso martini behind the restaurant bar. Freshness is a key part of the delicate flavor. Villa says the coffee is in Boston typically within two weeks of roasting.

“It goes from the farm to your cup,” she says. “You can tell when it’s fresh. The first thing people do when they get a bag is smell it, the aroma is so strong.”

By day Villa works as a clinical manager at the Oral and Facial Surgery Centers of Massachusetts and picks up shifts as a server at Henrietta’s Table for extra cash. She currently takes orders for ground coffee or whole bean bags on Instagram and delivers in East Boston, Chelsea, Revere, and beyond.

But her dream is to launch a coffee truck selling fresh brews and pastries, and ultimately to have a brick-and-mortar cafe serving Don Luis coffee in Boston.

Part of that process, Villa says, will be educating an American audience about Colombian coffee culture. She’s noticed that many Americans drink coffee for fuel and primarily in the mornings with breakfast. In La Vega, it’s an evergreen opportunity to slow down and enjoy a moment with friends and family.

Today only, pay what you can at these Boston-area restaurants

GLOBE CORRESPONDENT

If dining out feels increasingly steep these days, here’s an opportunity that may be within your reach.

Today, Aug. 26, restaurants around the world are participating in Paga Lo Que Puedas, or Pay What You Can: a global hospitality initiative started by Mexico City restaurant Masala y Maíz that invites diners to eat what they want and pay what they’re able to.

Local participants include Dorchester’s Comfort Kitchen and Barra in Union Square, which will be joining the effort with more than 100 other restaurants across 13 countries.

“We really want people to come on that day that wouldn’t normally feel like they could come,” said Nyacko Pearl Perry, a cofounder of Comfort Kitchen. “We would like our space to welcome them.”

One of Comfort Kitchen’s ongoing challenges, Perry said, is maintaining a high quality of food and service while offering a price point that still makes sense for everyone.

“We consider ourselves to be pushing up against what fine dining is,” she said. “We want to create luxurious experiences, but we don’t want to be stuffy. We don’t want people to feel like they can’t come in.”

For the promotion to be financially viable for both patrons and staff, restaurants are hoping for community support. Diners who can afford to pay more are encouraged to do so. Comfort Kitchen’s team is creating an internal “safety net” based on the staff’s average earnings on a Wednesday night. They’ll supplement the tips that come in.

Perry acknowledged that many restaurants wouldn’t be able to participate given their already razor-thin margins. Her cofounder and husband, Biplaw Rai, is also thinking about what restaurateurs can learn from the experience, and plans to share the day’s data with fellow restaurants.

“We are hoping ... that we learn new things on consumer behaviors and how people are paying,” Rai said. “And if people are being more generous.”

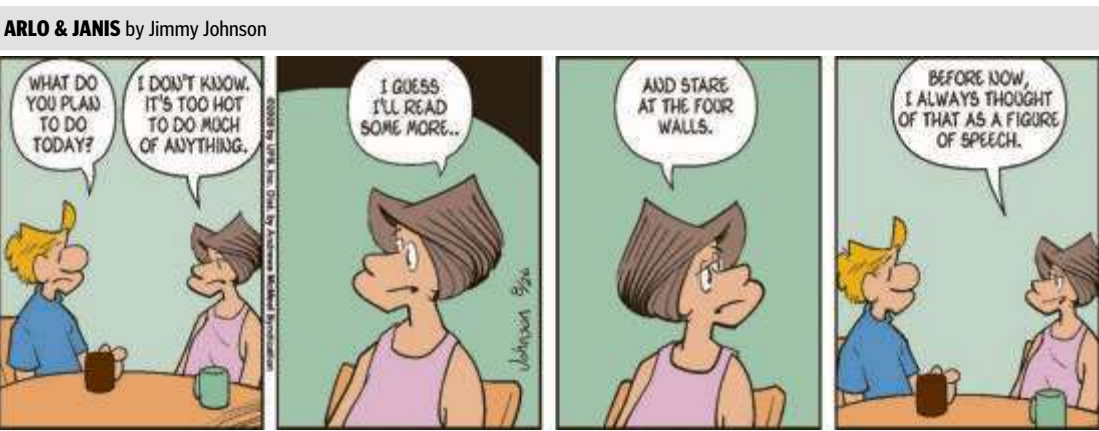

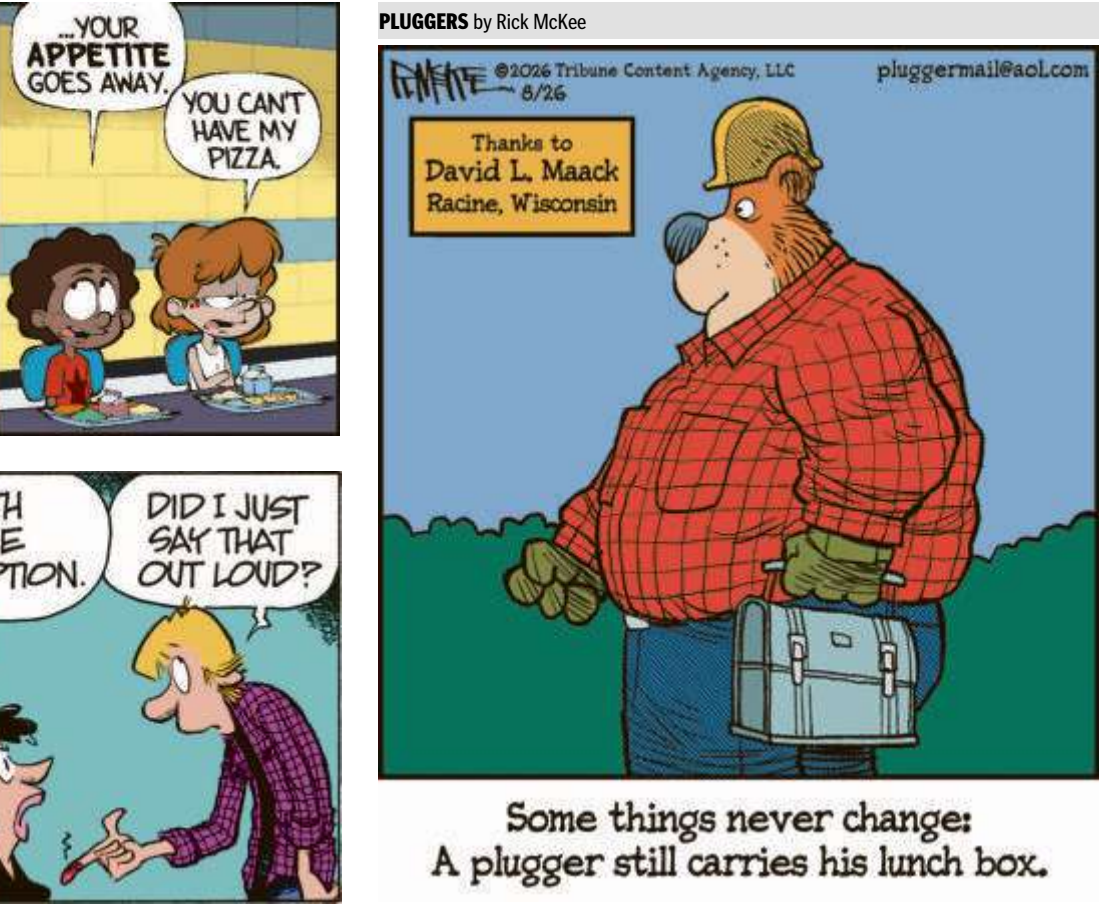

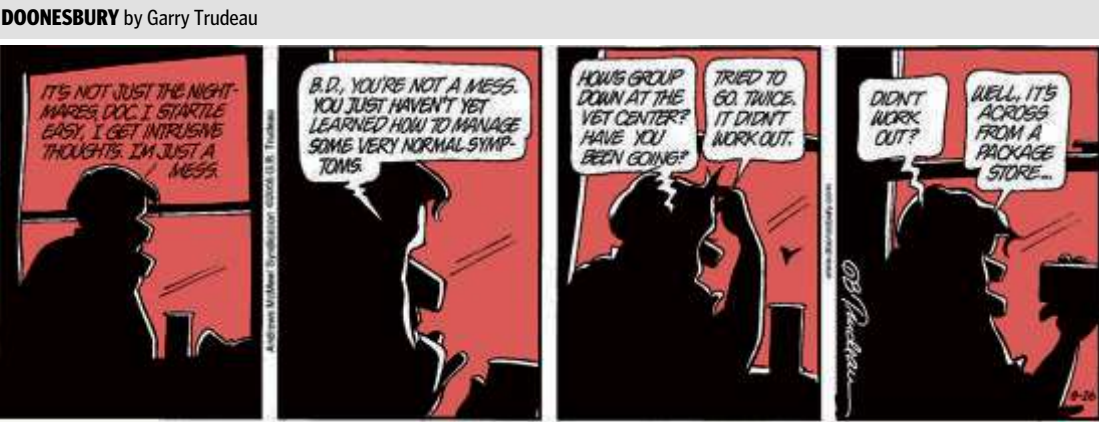

Barra co-owner Paola Ibarra said her restaurant has tried to offer more affordable bites and drinks as people spend less, even outside of this particular promotion. She said that small, independent places like Barra have been affected financially, but they still want to be “close to” the community, regardless of price.

“We’re OK with running the risk,” she said. “If the risk is someone says, ‘I can’t pay a lot,’ we’re happy to share the cost with other customers. It’s a good initiative, and we’re ready to try it.”

John Cena appeared on “Conan O’Brien Needs a Friend.”

John Cena and Conan O’Brien talk losing their Boston accents

John Cena and Conan O’Brien dished about when and how they stopped speaking with their Boston accents during Monday’s episode of O’Brien’s podcast, “Conan O’Brien Needs a Friend.”

Stopping by the podcast while making the press rounds for his new flick, “Coyote vs. Acme,” Cena chatted with O’Brien about a variety of topics, including how they both grew up in Massachusetts (Cena is from West Newbury, O’Brien hails from Brookline). However, O’Brien noted that both he and Cena don’t necessarily come across as Bay State natives.

“It’s funny because I’m from Massachusetts, but I don’t know that I seem like a guy from Massachusetts. You don’t seem like a guy [from Massachusetts],” O’Brien said.

After Cena revealed that he grew up with a strong Boston accent, O’Brien admitted that he used to have one too, but lost it over the years.

“When I look at old footage of me, I have a Boston accent, and I didn’t even try to make it go away,” O’Brien said.

“I remember it not even being a conscious choice,” he said later in the conversation about losing the accent. “I think it was just erosion.”

As for Cena, he grew up talking like everyone else in town, but eventually learned to speak without the accent.

“Everyone just talked like that,” Cena told O’Brien. “And then you get put in a pool of people who have varying accents and you realize, ‘Oh my god, I sound a certain way,’ and that might get misunderstood later on in life.”

Cena said he dropped the accent while attending a “dormitory school” as a teenager.

“They kind of nudged me in the right direction of like, ‘Hey, you can also learn to speak a different way, if you’d like,’” Cena said.

And while he may not sound like a Masshole these days, Cena admitted that the accent does come back to him whenever he’s having a few brews with his brothers back in Massachusetts.

“Honestly, get me around them and like six beers deep, it comes back instantaneously, and I can’t shut it off,” Cena said, later joking, “The first time my wife heard it, she’s like, ‘What the [expletive] happened to you?’ I don’t understand what they’re saying, now I don’t understand what you’re saying.”

Q. Our youngest child has worked only part time for the past two years, despite being a single mother to two children. At the same time her job situation deteriorated, my husband and I moved away from the city where we all had lived. Our daughter felt abandoned when we left, especially since my husband and I were baby sitters, money givers, homework doers, food suppliers, etc.

Our daughter was invited to move with us but could not because of the father. Courts would not allow it.

We have been helping our daughter with many expenses: car insurance for two cars, cellphone for her and her kids, internet, Netflix, cable, laundry, incidentals, and food. Plus, we have helped with the rent on and off and helped with summer classes for the kids, legal fees, special ed teachers, et cetera. Her ex contributes what the courts told him to and not a penny more.

These expenses have been very hard on my husband and me financially. We dipped into our savings three times and once took money out of our house. Now, once again, we have more than $30,000 in credit card debt, and none of the expenses are ours.

When I tried to explain this problem to our daughter, she flipped out, as she occasionally does. Most of the time she is nice to us. Sometimes, she yells the house down at us and calls us names.

I discussed this problem with my sister, and she said I was being manipulated, that our daughter needed therapy, and that we should cut her off and set boundaries. But how can we cut off our adored grandchildren from food and clean clothes and shoes and school supplies?

Recent sightings on Cape Cod (through Aug. 18) as reported to Mass Audubon.

The famously friendly bridled tern summering in Scituate once again visited the Cape, this time interacting with a woman and her dog at Seagull Beach in Yarmouth.

At least 3 swallow-tailed kites continued along Route 28 in Cotuit and nearby areas.

Birds tallied at Nauset Inlet in Orleans/Eastham included 4,415 semipalmated plovers, 21 piping plovers, 40 short-billed dowitchers, 7 white-rumped sandpipers, 1,130 semipalmated sandpipers, 115 least terns,

Daughter drives parents deep into debt

We are drowning. She has two of my credit cards and all the charges are hers. The rest of her expenses come directly out of my checking account. Can you help?

AFRAID OF MY OWN DAUGHTER’S TEMPER

A. Listen to your sister. It won’t serve you, your daughter, or your grandchildren for you to sink into financial ruin.

Write a budget for yourself and be very upfront with your daughter about what the limits of that budget are. Set up external boundaries — if you choose to keep paying her credit cards, lower the limits so that the credit card companies won’t approve charges that exceed them, for instance.

She may argue that you have the money and should give it but, without putting too fine a point on it, it seems clear that you don’t have the money. You are borrowing against your house and in a lot of debt.

This isn’t simply a matter of you choosing to let your grandchildren go without; the money isn’t there. Her anger is misdirected; indeed, it does seem manipulative. Regardless, it’s not solving any problems.

If she can’t engage with you civilly, you have to set a boundary there, too.

If reducing your support means that your grandchildren would go without clean clothes, there’s a larger issue in the system here that you can’t solve on your own. But there are many steps before that.

Netflix is not a requirement, for instance. The second car may not be necessary. A financial adviser or a free budgeting program can help you identify some places to cut.

4 Forster’s terns, and 12 roseate terns.

A survey of a remote part of Monomoy National Wildlife Refuge turned up 20 American oystercatchers, 1,015 black-bellied plovers, 1,665 semipalmated plovers, a Hudsonian whimbrel, 2 Hudsonian godwits, 4 marbled godwits, 1,695 short-billed dowitchers, 159 ruddy turnstones, 359 red knots, 2,755 sanderlings, a Baird’s sandpiper, 9 white-rumped sandpipers, 3,230 semipalmated sandpipers, 200 common terns, and 300 roseate terns.

Q. I’m 40 years old; I have three teenage daughters and have been married to my new husband for almost a year.

I was recently prescribed a pair of glasses just for reading. My husband thinks that I look fantastic in them and has asked a few times if I would consider wearing them all the time.

I did order blended bifocals so I could keep them on at the office, and I really could comfortably just leave them on.

Personally, I feel I’m more attractive without them and that they make me look older. I can’t decide what to do.

Should I continue wearing them only when I really need to? Or should I give them a try for a couple of weeks as my husband has suggested?

GLASSES HALF FULL

A. It’s lovely that your husband is being supportive and is free with his compliments and requests, but what’s most important with regard to your appearance is that you feel comfortable. So, if you only want to wear the glasses when you need them, don’t give it a second thought. He can learn to see it as a special treat.

It’s great that he thinks you look fantastic — and I’m sure you do — but if you start wearing them for him and you don’t feel great about it too, it might sour the experience.

Better to let the glasses do what they’re intended to do: help you read. Anything else is just an added benefit.
